A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp.

BY

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE,

AUTHOR OF "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."

"Away to the Dismal Swamp he speeds,—
His path was rugged and sore,
Through tangled juniper, beds of reeds,
And many a fern where the serpent feeds
Where man never trod before.
"And when on the ground he sunk to sleep,
If slumber his eyelids know,
He lay where the deadly vine doth weep
Its venomous tears, that nightly steep
The flesh in blistering dew."

PREFACE.

THE publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin disclosed the sorrows of the American people.

When the publication of such sorrows was disputed, the Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin was published, and to this no answer has ever been returned. A profound silence has always reigned with regard to the book in quarters whence there was the most clamor with regard to the 'ale.

The author has never seen, nor heard of, any attempt to disprove or refute a single statement of the Key.

Meanwhile, during the five years that have passed since the publication of the story, the great EVIL has marched on to its results with a terrible and undeviating tread. The foolish virgins, who all slumbered and slept, the respectable and tender-hearted, who, in ignorant sincerity, cried peace when there was no peace, have one by one been awakened in wild surprise; and the foolish have said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps have gone out.

The few who then fought the battle of liberty almost single-handed, those Cassandras who for many years saw the coming evil and prophesied to unheeding ears, now find themselves at the head of a mighty army, and in a crisis that must speedily determine what shall be the working out of this great evil, whether it shall issue peaceably or in blood.

When Uncle Tom was published, sentimental humanity was shocked that its author could represent a Legree beating defenceless Uncle Tom on the head with a cow-hide; but sentimental humanity has lately seen, with her own eyes, the accomplished scholar and gentleman, the senator of a sovereign state, struck down unarmed and unsuspecting, by a cowardly blow, and, while thus prostrate, still beaten by the dastard arm which had learned its skill on a South Carolina plantation.

Sentimental humanity then loudly declared her belief that the chivalry of South Carolina would repudiate the act. The chivalry of South Carolina presented the ruffian with a cane, bearing the inscription, "Hit him again;" and presents a silver plate and congratulatory letters from public meetings flowed in, mixed with tenderer testimonials from the gentler sex; and the cowardly bully, forced by public sentiment to resign his seat, has been, in insulting defiance of that sentiment, triumphantly returned by the citizens of South Carolina: and his act was openly vindicated by Southern members in the places in both houses of Congress.

After this who will doubt what the treatment of free men, or is likely to be, in the hands of men educated in such influences?—"If these things are done in the North, what shall be done in the South?"

The Author's object in this book is to show the general effect of slavery on society—the various social disadvantages which it brings even on its most favoured advocates—the thriftlessness and misery and backward tendency of all the economical arrangements of slave states—the retrograding of good families into poverty—the deterioration of land—the worse demoralization of all classes from the aristocratic tyrannical planter to the oppressed and poor white—which is the result of the introduction of slave labour.

It is also an object to display the corruption of Christianity which arises from the same source; a corruption which has gradually lowered the standard of the Church, North and South, and been productive of more infidelity than the works of all the Encyclopædists put together.

As an illustration of the corrupted state of Christianity, the author need only adduce the following fact, related to her by one of her family connexions—a minister of the Gospel, resident in Missouri at the time when organizations were being formed to go into Kansas and forcibly take away the rights of the ballot-box from the citizens of that territory.

This gentleman had gone to Missouri, with the fond hope that he would be allowed to preach the Gospel, if he would say nothing about slavery. He informed the writer that all the church members and elders, and even ministers in his vicinity, openly justified and spoke in favour of this movement, and in many cases even joined the party who went to effect it; and for daring to lift his voice in very gentle remonstrance, his situation was made so uncomfortable that he was obliged to leave the state.

The regiment of Colonel Buford, which has distinguished itself by indiscriminate pillage and murder, left Alabama amid an enthusiastic popular concourse, with addresses and prayers from clergymen cheering them on.

This winter has witnessed the most shocking cold-blooded murders of men in Kansas, for the simple crime of avowing opposition to slavery. The city of Lawrence has been sacked, with atrocities which it was hoped had been discarded in modern warfare; and yet neither the new nor the old school assembly of the Presbyterian church, assembled in their public capacity, have uttered one word indicative of disapprobation of these proceedings, and the defences of slavery in both these cities have never been so open and unblushing. The same is no with regard to the Methodist general conference, although not quite to the same extent.

These facts speak for themselves. They show more strongly anything else the force of the demoralizing power that is at work.

The author desires to anticipate one criticism, which may be made on the dramatic representations of this volume :—

It was represented to her, after the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin, that the profanity attributed to some of the characters was a painful shock to the religious feelings of the community.

The author has given this subject a serious consideration, and it is a deliberate opinion formed as the result, that in a dramatic exhibition made for moral purposes, it is necessary sometimes even to pain the moral sense in order to give the full force of the lesson.

If a certain style of society induces profaneness and contempt of all reverential considerations, an author cannot make this realized without in some cases shocking the reverential feelings of the readers. How is it possible to represent the conversation of men, whose every breath is an oath, without the admission of some touches of the pencil, shocking to the minds of the pious? We are apt to think in such cases that what pains us must necessarily injure, when, in fact, that pain is an indication of a healthy state of the moral organization. The Scriptures, whose representations of evil and of good are always dramatic, give, without reserve, the boastings of the profane, who defy the Lord, as well as the adorations of those who worship Him. The haughty Pharaoh says, "Who is the Lord that I should obey him?" The sensitive and irritable Jonah expostulates in language quite unlike the reverence of a common prayer, and the words and deeds of the wicked are told with a homely plainness which makes the fastidious shudder.

In considering, therefore, how far a moral artist may go on his subject—the moral purpose and result is to be taken into account.

If profanity and vice are rendered interesting in the person of a gay and accomplished hero, the good would indeed have reason to complain; but while it is held up in the characters of those confessedly formed under the influences of an evil system, it may be a necessary part of the exhibition.

Let it not be said that the people of England do not need the enlightening power of such exhibitions—that they have nothing to do with the evil. They have much to do with it; it is vital to them as well as to us. When they read in these pages how good men to secure good purposes are led first to endure, then to pity, then to embrace the monster which has been the cause of all this evil—when they see how the standard of Christianity in a whole nation has been insensibly lowered—let them not be high-minded, but fear. England is connected with America by the same ties of interest, trade, relationship, and religious fraternity, that have bound together the North and the South.

Every year the power of steam is drawing these ties closer, and it is for her Christianity to decide whether, for the sake of good or gain of any description, it will begin that course of endurance which has always ended at last in an embrace. Are there not some signs of the times in England? When defences not only of slavery, but of the slave-trade, begin to appear in respectable quarters, is it not time to ask whereto these things will grow?

The party in America, who in the coming election are to make a stand against this tremendous evil, may possibly meet a temporary defeat; it is always best to look the worst issue steadily in the face. The Christianity of England have to ponder the question, whether if slavery becomes triumphant, they for the sake of trade and gain will join the acclamation and follow the victorious car? Will the British Lion be led in cotton bands by such hands as smote down Charles Sumner?

One word more is due to the Free States in America: much as they have erred, it is but justice to them to say that the error has not been entirely one either of cowardice or of interest; something is certainly due to a generous credulity unwilling to believe the worst of brethren, and that slowness to wrath which is characteristic of those who have been taught to rule their own spirit.

. That they have not yet avenged the insult to their senator, the violation of their free ballot-box, the burning of their towns, and the murders of their brethren and sons, is no sign that they have not felt them; it simply shows the grandeur of that law-abiding education which is given by true freedom, which seeks its redress not by immediate violence, but by those surer methods provided by national law. Should all these fail, we have only to say, "Wo to the aggressor when they who are slow to anger are at last aroused."

But though we have alluded to the worst possibilities, we rejoice in saying that everything now promises in our next election a triumphant vindication of Liberty and Right in America.

CHAPTER I.

THE MISTRESS OF CANEMA.

• BILLS, Harry? Yes. Dear me where are they? There?—no. Here? O, look! what do you think of this scarf? Isn't it lovely?

‘Yes, Miss Nina, beautiful; but’—

‘O, those bills!—yes. Well, here goes,—here perhaps in this box. No, that's my opera hat. By-the-by, what do you think of that? Isn't that bunch of silver wheat lovely? Stop a bit, you shall see it on me.’

And with these words the slight little figure sprang up as if it had wings, and, humming a waltzing-tune, skimmed across the room to a looking-glass, and placed the jaunty little cap on the gay little head, and then, turning a pirouette on one toe, said ‘There now! There now!’ Ah, Harry! ah, mankind generally! the wisest of you have been made fools of by just such dancing, glittering, fluttering little assortments of curls, pendants, streamers, eyes, cheeks, and dimples.

The little figure, scarce the height of the Venus, rounded as that of an infant, was shown to advantage by a coquettish morning-dress of buff muslin, which fluttered open in front to display the embroidered skirt and trim little mouse of a slipper. The face was one of those provoking ones which sets criticism at defiance. The hair—waving, curling, dancing hither and thither—seemed to have a wild, laughing grace of its own. The brown eyes twinkled like the pendants of a chandelier. The little wicked nose, which bore the forbidden upward curve, seemed to assert its right to do so with a saucy freedom; and the pendants of multiplied brilliants that twinkled in her ears, and the nodding wreath of silver wheat that set off her opera hat, seemed alive with mischief and motion.

‘Well, what do you think?’ said a lively imperative voice—just the kind of voice that you might have expected from the figure.

THE MISTRESS OF CANEMA.

The young man to whom this question was addressed was a well-dressed gentlemanly person of about thirty-five, with dark complexion and hair and deep blue eyes. There was something marked and peculiar in the square high forehead and the finely-formed features which indicated talent and ability, and the blue eyes had a depth and strength of colour that might cause them at first glance to appear black. The face, with its strongly-marked expression of honesty and sense, had about it many care-worn and thoughtful lines. He looked at the little defiant fay for a moment with an air of the most entire deference and admiration, then a heavy shadow crossed his face, and he answered distractedly,

'Yes, Miss Nina, everything you wear becomes that is perfectly charming.'

'Isn't it, now, Harry? I thought you would say so; you see it's my own idea. You ought to have seen what a thing it was when I first saw it in Mademoiselle Blanche's window. There was a great crowd about it, and two or three horrid bows. But she took it out in a twinkling, and got this wheat in, which shakes so, you know. It's perfectly lovely. Well, do you believe, the very night I wore it to the opera I got engaged.'

'Engaged! Miss Nina?'

'Engaged! yes, to be sure! Why not?'

'It seems to me that's a very serious thing, Miss Nina.'

'Serious! ha! ha! ha!' said the little beauty, seating herself on one arm of the sofa, and shaking the glittering hat back from her eyes. 'Well, I fancy it was—to him at least. I made him serious, I can tell you.'

'But is this true, Miss Nina? Are you really engaged?'

'Yes, to be sure I am, to three gentlemen, and going to stay so till I find which I like best. May be, you know, I shan't like any of them.'

'Engaged to three gentlemen, Miss Nina!'

'To be sure. Can't you understand English, Harry? I am now—fact.'

'Miss Nina, is that right?'

'Right! why not? I don't know which to take—I positively don't; so I took them all on trial, you know.'

'Really, Miss Nina! Tell us who they are.'

'Well, there's Mr. Carson; he's a rich old bachelor, horridly polite; one of those little bobbing men that always have such shining dickies and collars, and such bright boots, and such tight straps; and he's rich, and perfectly wild about me. He wouldn't take No for an answer, so I just said Yes, you know, to have a little quiet. Besides he is very convenient about the opera and concerts and such things.'

'Well, and the next.'

'Well, the next is George Emmons. He's one of your pink-and-white men, you know, who look like cream candy, as if they were good to eat. He's a lawyer of a good family, thought a good deal of, and all that. Well, really they say he has talents—'m no judge. I know he always bores me to death, asking me if I have read this or that; marking places in books I never read. He's your sort, writes the most romantic notes on pink paper about nothing.'

'And the—'

'Well, you see, a bit, I'm sure I don't. He's a hateful creature; he's some; he's proud as Lucifer; and I'm sure I don't know he got me ragged. It was a kind of an accident. He's real good, too good for me, that's a fact. But then, I am afraid of him a little.'

'And his name?'

'Well, his name is Clayton—Mr. Edward Clayton, at your service. He's one of your high-and-mighty people, with such deep-set eyes—eyes that look as if they were in a cave—and such black hair! and his eyes have a desperate sort of sad look, sometimes quite Byronic. He's tall and rather loose-jointed; has beautiful teeth; his mouth, too, is—well, when he smiles, sometimes it really is quite fascinating; and then he's so different from other gentlemen. He's kind, but he don't care how he dresses, and wears the most horrid shoes. And then, he isn't polite; he won't jump, you know, to pick up your thread or scissors; and sometimes he'll get into a brown study, and let you stand ten minutes before he thinks to give you a chair, and all such provoking things. He isn't a bit of a lady's man. Well, the consequence is, as my lord won't court the girls, the girls all court my lord—that's the way, you know. And they seem to think it's such a feather in their cap to get attention from him, because, you know, he's horrid sensible. So, you see, that just set me out to see what I could do with him. Well, you see, I wouldn't court him, and I plagued him, and laughed at him, and spited him, and got him gloriously wroth; and he said some spiteful things about me, and then I said some more about him, and we had a real up-and-down quarrel; and then I took a penitent turn, you know, and just went gracefully down into the valley of humiliation—as we witches can—and it took wonderfully, brought my lord on his knees before he knew what he was doing. Well, really I don't know what was the matter just then, but he spoke so earnest and strong that actually he got me to crying—hateful creature!—and I promised all sorts of things, you know, said altogether more than will bear thinking of.'

'And are you corresponding with all these lovers, Miss Nina?'

'Yes; isn't it fun? Their letters, you know, can't speak; if they could, when they come rustling together in the bag, wouldn't there be a muss?'

'Miss Nina, I think you have given your heart to the last one.'

'O, nonsense, Harry! Haven't got any heart! Don't care two pins for any of them! All I want is to have a good time. As to love and all that, I don't believe I could love any of them. I should be tired to death of any of them in six weeks; I never liked anything that long.'

'Miss Nina, you must excuse me, but I want to ask you again, is it right to trifle with the feelings of gentlemen in this way?'

'Why not? Isn't all fair in war? Don't they trifle with us girls every chance they get, and sit up so pompous in their rooms and smoke cigars, and talk us over as if they only had to put out their finger and say, "Come here," to get any of us? I tell you it's fun to bring them down. Now, there's that horrid George Emmons, I tell you, if he did not flirt all winter with Mary Stephens, and got everybody to laughing about her. It was so evident, you see, that she liked him, she couldn't help showing it, poor little thing! And then my lord would settle his collar, and say he hadn't quite made up his mind to take her, and all that. Well, I haven't made up my mind to take him either, and so poor Mary is avenged. As to the old bach—that smooth-dicky man—you see, he can't be hurt, for his heart is rubbed as smooth and hard as his dicky, with falling in love and out again. He's been turned off by three girls, now, and his shoes squeak as brisk as ever, and he's just as jolly. You see, he didn't use to be so rich. Lately he's come into a splendid property; so, if I don't take him, poor man, there are enough that would be glad of him.'

'Well, then, but as to that other one?'

'What? my Lord Lofty? O, he wants humbling!—it wouldn't hurt him, in the least, to be put down a little. He's good, too, and afflictions always improve good people. I believe I was made for a means of grace to 'em all.'

'Miss Nina, what if all three of them should come at once—or even two of them?'

'What a droll idea! wouldn't it be funny? Just to think of it! What a commotion! what a scene! It would really be vastly entertaining.'

'Now, Miss Nina, I want to speak as a friend.'

'No, you shan't! it is just what people say when they are going to say something disagreeable. I told Clayton, once for all that I wouldn't have him speak as a friend to me.'

W. how does he take all this?'

'—hy, just as he must. He cares a great deal more for me than for him.' Here a slight little sigh escaped the fair speaker. 'And I think it fun to shock him. You know he is one of the fatherly sort, who is always advising young girls. Let it be understood that I am not at all afraid of female character is wonderfully high, and as a rule, I don't, then, to think of his being tripped up before me!—it is funny!' The little sprite here took off her opera-hat, and commenced waltzing a few steps, and stopping mid-whirl, exclaimed: 'O, do you know, we girls have been trying to learn the cachucha, and I have got some castanets! Let me see, where are they?' And with this she proceeded to upset the trunk, from which flew a meteoric shower of bracelets, billets-doux, French Grammars, drawing-pencils, interspersed with confectionary of various descriptions, and all the et-ceteras of a school-girl's depository. 'There, upon my word, there are the bills you were asking for. There, take them!' throwing a package of papers at the young man. 'Take them! Can you catch?'

'Miss Nina, these do not appear to be bills.'

'O, bless me! those are love-letters, then. The bills are somewhere.' And the little hands went pawing among the heap, making the fanciful collection fly in every direction over the carpet. 'Ah! I believe now in this bonbon box I did put them. Take care of your head, Harry!' And, with the word, the gilded missile flew from the little hand, and opening on the way, showered Harry with a profusion of crumpled papers. 'Now you have got them all, except one, that I used for curl-papers, the other night. O, don't look so sober about it! Indeed, I kept the pieces—here they are. And now don't you say, Harry, don't you tell me that I never save my bills, You don't know how particular I have been, and what trouble I have taken. But there—there's a letter Clayton wrote to me, one time when we had a quarrel. Just a specimen of that creature?

“Pray, tell us about it, Miss Nina,” said the young man, with his eyes fixed admiringly on the little person, while he was smoothing and arranging the crumpled documents.

“Why, you see, it was just this way. You know, these men—how provoking they are! They'll go and read all sorts of books—no matter what they read!—and then they are so dreadfully particular about us girls. Do you know, Harry, this always made me angry? Well, so, you see, one evening, Sophy Elliot quoted some poetry from Don Juan; I never read it, but it seems folks call it a bad book, and my Lord Clayton immediately fixed his eyes upon her in such an appalling way, and says, “Have you read Don Juan, Miss Elliot?” Then, you know, as girls always do in such cases, she blushed and stammered, and said her brother had read some extracts from it to her. I was vexed and said, “And pray, what's the harm if she did read it? I mean to read it, the very first chance I get.” Oh! everybody looked so shocked. Why, dear me! if I had said I was going to commit murder, Clayton could not have looked more concerned. So he put on that very edifying air of his, and said “Miss Nina, I trust, as your friend, that you will not read that book. I should lose all respect for a lady friend who had read that.” “Have you read it, Mr. Clayton,” said I. “Yes, Miss Nina,” said he, quite piously. “What makes you read such bad books?” said I, very innocently. Then there followed a general fuss and talk; and the gentlemen, you know, would not have their wives or their sisters read anything naughty for the world. They wanted us all to be like snow-flakes, and all that. And they were quite high, telling they wouldn't marry this, and they wouldn't marry that, till, at last, I made them a courtesy, and said, “Gentlemen, we ladies are infinitely obliged to you, but we don't intend to marry people that read naughty books, either. Of course, you know, “snow-flakes don't like soot!” Now, I really didn't mean anything by it, except to put down these men, and stand up for my sex. But Clayton took it in real earnest. He grew red and grew pale, and was just as angry as he could be. Well, the quarrel raged about three days. Then, do you know, I made him give up, and own that he was in the wrong. There, I think he was, too. Don't you? Don't you think men ought to be as good as we are, anyway?”

'Miss Nina, I should think you would be afraid to express yourself so positively.'

'O, if I cared a son for any of them, perhaps I should. But there isn't one of the train that I would give that for!' said she, flinging a shower of peanut-shells into the air.

'Yes, but Miss Nina, some time or other, you must marry somebody. You need somebody to take care of the property and place.'

'O, that's it, is it? You are tired of keeping accounts, are you, with me to spend the money? Well, I don't wonder. How I pity anybody that keeps accounts! Isn't it horrid, Harry? These awful books! Do you know that Madame Arldaine set out that "we girls" should keep accounts of our expenses? I just tried it for a week. I had a headache and weak eyes, and actually it nearly ruined my constitution. Somehow or other they gave it up, it gave me so much trouble. And what's the use? When money's spent, it's spent; and keeping accounts ever so strict won't get it back. I am very careful about my expenses. I never get anything that I can do without.'

'For instance,' said Harry, rather roguishly, 'this bill of one hundred dollars for confectionery.'

'Well, you know just how it is, Harry. It's so horrid to have to study! Girls must have something; and you know I didn't get it all for myself: I gave it round to all the girls. Then they used to ask me for it, and I couldn't refuse—and so it went.'

'I didn't presume to comment, Miss Nina. What have we here?—"Madame Les Cartes, four hundred and fifty dollars."'

'O, Harry, that horrid Madame Les Cartes! You never saw anything like her! Positively it is not my fault. She puts down things I never got; I know she does. Nothing in the world but because she is from Paris. Everybody is complaining of her. But, then, nobody gets anything anywhere else. So what can one do, you know? I assure you, Harry, I am economical.'

The young man who had been summing up the accounts, now burst into such a hearty laugh as somewhat disconcerted the fair rhetorician. She coloured to her temples.

'Harry, now, for shame! Positively, you aren't respectful!'

'O Miss Nina, on my knees I beg pardon!' still continuing to laugh; 'but, indeed, you must excuse me. I am, positively, delighted to hear of your economy, Miss Nina.'

'Well, now, Harry, you may look at the bills, and see—Haven't I ripped up all my silk dresses, and had them coloured over, just to economise? You can see the dyer's bill there; and Madame Caterne told me she always expected to turn my dresses twice, at least. O, yes, I have been very economical!'

'I have heard of old dresses turned costing more than new ones, Miss Nina.'

'O, nonsense, Harry! What should you know of girls' things? But I'll tell you one thing I've got, Harry, and that is a gold watch for you. Here it is,' throwing a case carelessly towards him; 'and there's a silk dress for your wife,' throwing him a little parcel. 'I have sense enough to know what a good fellow you are, at any rate. I couldn't go on as I do, if you didn't rack your poor head fifty ways to keep things going straight here at home for me.'

A host of conflicting emotions seemed to cross the young man's face like a shadow of clouds over a field, as he silently undid the packages. His hands trembled, his lips quivered, but he said nothing.

'Come, Harry, don't this suit you? I thought it would.'

'Miss Nina, you are too kind.'

'No, I'm not, Harry. I'm a selfish little concern, that's a fact,' said she, turning away, and pretending not to see the feeling which agitated him. 'But, Harry, wasn't it droll, this morning, when all our people came up to get their presents! There was aunt Sue, and aunt Tike, and aunt Kate, each one got a new sack pattern, in which they are going to make up the prints I brought them. In about two days our place will be flaming with aprons and sacks. And did you see aunt Rose in that pink bonnet with the flowers? You could see every tooth in her head! Of course now they'll be taken with a very pious streak, to go to some camp-meeting or other, to show their finery. Why don't you laugh, Harry?'

'I do, don't I, Miss Nina?'

'You only laugh on your face; you don't laugh deep down. What's the matter? I don't believe it's good for you to read and study so much. Papa used to say that he didn't think it was good for—' She stopped, checked by the expression on the face of her listener.

'For servants, Miss Nina, your papa said, I suppose.'

With the quick tact of her sex, Nina perceived that she had struck some disagreeable chord in the mind of her faithful attendant, and she hastened to change the subject, in her careless, rattling way.

‘Why, yes, Harry, study is horrid for you, or me either, or anybody else, except musty old people, who don’t know how to do anything else. Did ever anybody look out of doors, such a pleasant day as this, and want to study? Think of a bird’s studying, now, or a bee! They don’t study—they live. Now, I don’t want to study, I want to live. So, now, Harry, if you’ll just get the ponies and go in the woods, I want to get some jessamines, and spring beauties, and wild honeysuckles, and all the rest of the flowers that I used to get before I went to school.’

CHAPTER II.

THE curtain rises on our next scene in a library, illuminated by the slant rays of the sun. On one side the room opened by long glass windows into the garden, from whence the air came in perfumed with the breath of roses and honeysuckles. The floor covered with white matting, the couches and sofas robed in smooth glazed linen, gave an air of freshness and coolness to the apartment. The walls were hung with prints of the great master-pieces of European art, while bronzes and plaster casts, distributed with taste and skill, gave evidence of artistic culture in the general arrangement. Two young men were sitting together near the opened window, at a small table, which displayed an antique coffee-set of silver, and a silver tray of ices and fruits. One of these has already been introduced to the notice of our readers, in the description of our heroine in the last chapter. Edward Clayton, the only son of Judge Clayton, and representative of one of the oldest and most distinguished families of North Carolina, was in personal appearance much what our lively young friend had sketched—tall, slender, with a sort of loose-jointedness and carelessness of dress, which might have produced an impression of clownishness, had it not been relieved by a refined and intellectual expression on the head and face. The upper part of the face gave the impression of thoughtfulness and strength, with a shadowing of melancholy earnestness; and there was about the eye, in conversation, that occasional gleam of troubled wildness which betrays the hypochondriac temperament. The mouth was even feminine in the delicacy and beauty of its lines, and the smile which sometimes played around it had a peculiar fascination. It seemed to be a smile of but half the man's nature; for it never rose as high as the eyes, or seemed to disturb the dark stillness of their thoughtfulness. The other speaker was in many respects a contrast; and we will introduce him to our readers by the name of Frank Russel; furthermore, for their benefit, we will premise that he was the only son of a once distinguished and wealthy, but now almost decayed family of Virginia. It is supposed by many that friendship is best founded upon similarity of nature! but observation teaches that it is more commonly a union of opposites, in which each party is attracted by something wanting in itself. In Clayton, the great preponderance of those faculties which draw a man inward, and impair the efficiency of the outward life, inclined him to over-value the active and practical faculties, because he saw them constantly attended with a kind of success which he fully appreciated, but was unable to attain. Perfect ease of manner, ready presence of mind under all social exigencies, adroitness in making the most of passing occurrences, are qualities which are seldom the gift of sensitive and deeply-thoughtful natures, and which for this very reason they are often disposed to over-value. Russel was one of those men who have just enough of all the higher faculties to appreciate their existence in others, and not enough of any one to disturb the perfect availability of his own mind. Everything in his mental furnishing was always completely under his own control, and on hand for use at a moment's notice. From infancy he was noted for quick tact and ready reply. At school he was the universal factotum, the 'good fellow' of the ring, heading all the mischief among the boys, and yet walking with exemplary gravity on the blind side of the master. Many a scrape had he rescued Clayton from, into which he had fallen from a more fastidious moral sense, a more scrupulous honour, than is for worldly profit either in the boy's or man's sphere; and Clayton, superior as he was, could not help loving and depending on him. The diviner part of man is often shamefaced and self-distrustful, ill at home in this world, and standing in awe of nothing so much as what is called common sense; and yet common sense very often, by its own keenness, is able to see that these unavailable currencies of another's mind are of more worth, if the world only knew it, than the ready coin of its own; and so the practical and the ideal nature are drawn together. So Clayton and Russel had been friends from boyhood; had roomed together their four years in college, and the instruments of a vastly-different quality had hitherto played the concerts of life with scarce a discord. In person Russel was of about the medium size, with a well-knit elastic frame, all whose movements were characterised by sprightliness and energy. He had a frank, open countenance, clear blue eyes, a high forehead, shaded by clusters of curling brown-hair; his flexible lips wore a good-natured yet half-sarcastic smile. His feelings, though not inconveniently deep, were easily touched; he could be moved to tears or to smiles, with the varying humour of a friend; but never so far as to lose his equipoise, or, as he phrased it, forget what he was about. But we linger too long in description. We had better let the reader hear the dramatis personæ, and then let him judge for himself.

‘Well, now,’ said Russel, as he leaned back in a stuffed leather chair, with a cigar between his fingers, ‘how considerate of them to go off to the marooning party, and leave us to ourselves, here! I say, our boys, what would now? Reading law, hey?—booked to be judge. Now, my dear fellow, if I had the opportunities that you only to step into my father’s shoes—I should be a lucky fellow.’

‘Well, you are welcome to all my chances,’ said Clayton, throwing himself on one of the lounges; ‘for I begin to see that I shall make very little of them.’

‘Why, what’s the matter? Don’t you like the study?’

‘The study, perhaps, well enough—but not the practice. Reading, the theory is always magnificent and grand. Law hath her seat in the bosom of God; her voice is the harmony of the world! You remember we used to declaim that. But then come to the practice of it, and what do you find? Are legal examinations anything like searching after truth? Does not an advocate commit himself to one-sided views of his subject, and habitually ignore all the truth on the other side? Why, if I practised law according to my conscience, I should be chased out of court in a week.’

‘There you are again, Clayton, with your everlasting conscience, which has been my plague ever since you were a boy, and I have never been able to convince you what a humbug it is! It’s what I call a crotchety conscience—always in the way of your doing like anybody else. I suppose then, of course, you won’t go into political life—great pity, too. You’d make a very imposing

'And what do you think the old Viri Romæ would do in Washington? What sort of a figure do you think Regulus, or Quintus Curtius, or Mucius Scaevola, would make there?'

'Well, to be sure, the style of political action has altered some what since those days. If political duties were what they were then—if a gulf would open in Washington, for example, you would be the fellow to plunge in, horse and all, for the good of the republic; or, if anything was to be done by putting your right hand into the fire and burning it off; or, if there were any Carthaginians who would cut off your eyelids, or roll you down hill in a barrel of nails, for truth and your country's sake, you would be on hand for any such matter. That's the sort of foreign embassy that you would be after. All these old-fashioned goings on would suit you to a T; but as to figuring in purple and fine linen, in Paris or London, as American minister, you would make a dismal business of it. But still I thought you might practise law in a wholesome, sensible way—take fees, make pleas with abundance of classical allusions, show off your scholarship, marry a rich wife, and make your children princes in the gates—all without treading on the toes of your too sensitive moral what-d'ye-call-ems. But you've done one thing like other folks, at least, if all's true that I've heard.'

'And what is that, pray?'

'What's that? Hear the fellow, now! how innocent we are! I suppose you think I haven't heard of your campaign in New York; carrying off that princess of little flirts, Miss Gordon.' Clayton responded to the charge only with a slight shrug and a smile, in which not only his lips but his eyes took part, while the colour mounted to his forehead. 'Now do you know, Clayton,' continued Russel, 'I like that. Do you know I always thought I should detest the woman that you should fall in love with? It seemed to me that such a portentous combination of all the virtues as you were planning for would be something like a comet—an alarming spectacle. Do you remember (I should like to know, if you do) just what that woman was to be?—was to have all the learning of a man, all the graces of a woman, (I think I have it by heart,) she was to be practical, poetical, pious, and everything else that begins with a p; she was to be elegant and earnest; take deep and extensive views of life, and there was to be a certain air about her, half Madonna, half Venus, made of every creature's best.

Ah bless us! what poor creatures we are! Here comes along our little coquette, flirting, tossing her fan, picks you up like a great, solid chip, as you are, and throws you into her chip-basket of beaux, and goes on dancing and flirting as before. Aren't you ashamed of it, now?"

"No, I am really much like the minister in our town, where we fitted for college, who married a pretty Polly Peters in his sixtieth year, and, when the elders came to inquire if she had the requisite qualifications for a pastor's lady, he told them that he 'dn't think she had! "But the fact is, brethren," said he, "though I don't pretend she is a saint, she is a very pretty little sinner, ai, I love her." That's just my case."

"Sensibly said; and, do you know, as I told you before, I'm perfectly delighted with it, because it is acting like other folks. But your fellow, do you think you have come to anything really like this little Venus of the sea-foam? Isn't it much the same as being engaged to a cloud or a butterfly? One wants a little streak of reality about it, that one must take for better or for worse. You have seen a butterfly. You really want a wife who will have some glimmer of opinion of the difference between you and the other things that walk and wear coats, and are called men."

"Well then, really," said Clayton, rousing himself, and speaking with energy, "I'll tell you just what it is: Nina Gordon is a flirt and a coquette—a spoiled child if you will. She is not at all the person I ever expected would obtain any power over me. She has no culture, no reading, no habits of reflection; but she has, after all, a certain tone and quality to her, a certain "timbre," as the French say of voices, which suits me. There is about her a mixture of energy, individuality, and shrewdness, which makes her, all uninformed as she is, more piquant and attractive than any woman I ever fell in with. She never reads; it is almost impossible to get her to read; but, if you can catch her ear for five minutes, her literary judgments have a peculiar freshness and truth. And so with her judgment on all other subjects, if you can stop her long enough to give you an opinion. As to heart, I think she has yet a wholly unawakened nature. She has lived only in the world of sensation, and that is so abundant and so buoyant in her that the deeper part still sleeps. It is only two or three times that I have seen a flash of this under nature look from her eyes and colour her voice and intonation. And I believe—I'm quite sure—that I am the only person in the world that ever touched it at all. I'm not at all sure that she loves me now, but I'm almost equally sure that she will.'

'They say,' said Russel, carelessly, 'that she is generally engaged to two or three at a time.'

'That may be also,' said Clayton, indolently. 'I rather suspect it to be the case now, but it gives me no concern. I've seen all the men by whom she is surrounded, and I know perfectly well there's not one of them that she cares a rush for.'

'Well, but my dear fellow, how can your extreme fastidious moral notions stand the idea of her practising this system of deception?'

'Why, of course, it isn't a thing to my taste; but then, like the old parson, if I love "the little sinner," what am I to do? I suppose you think it a lover's paradox; yet I assure you, though she deceives, she is not deceitful; though she acts selfishly, she is not selfish. The fact is, the child has grown up motherless, and an heiress, among servants. She has, I believe, a sort of an aunt, or some such relative, who nominally represents the head of the family to the eye of the world. But I fancy little madam has had full sway. Then she has been to a fashionable New York boarding-school, and that has developed the talent of shirking lessons, and evading rules, with a taste for side-walk flirtation. These are all the attainments that I ever heard of being got at a fashionable boarding-school, unless it be a hatred of books, and a general dread of literary culture.'

'And her estates are—'

'Nothing very considerable. Managed nominally by an old uncle of hers; really by a very clever quadroon servant, who was left her by her father, and who has received an education, and has talents very superior to what are common to those in his class. He is, in fact, the overseer of her plantation, and I believe the most loyal, devoted creature breathing.'

'Clayton,' said his companion, 'this affair might not be much to one who takes the world as I do, but for you it may be a little too serious. Don't get in beyond your depth.'

'You are too late, Russel, for that, I am in.'

'Well, then, good luck to you, my dear fellow! And now, as we are about it, I may as well tell you that I am in for it too. I suppose you have heard of Miss Benoir, of Baltimore. Well, she is my fate.'

'And are you really engaged?'

'All signed and sealed, and to be delivered next Christmas.'

‘Let’s hear about her.’

‘Well, she is of a good height (I always said I shouldn’t marry a short woman), not handsome, but reasonably well-looking; very fine manners—knows the world—plays and sings handsomely—has a snug little fortune. Now you know, I never held to marrying for money and nothing else; but then, as I’m situated, I could not have fallen in love without that requisite. Some people call this heartless. I don’t think it is. If I had met Mary Benoir, and had known that she hadn’t anything, why, I should have known that it wouldn’t do for me at all to cultivate any particular intimacy; but, knowing she had fortune, I looked a little further, and found she had other things, too. Now, if that’s marrying for money, so be it. Yours, Clayton, is a genuine case of falling in love. But, as for me, I walked in—’ ‘—’es wide open.’

‘And what—’ ‘—’ing to do with yourself in the world, Russel?’

‘I must get into practice—’ ‘—’ some foothold there, you know; and then, hey for Washington. I’m to be president, like every other adventurer in these United States. Why not I as well as another man?’

‘I don’t know, certainly,’ said Clayton, ‘if you want it, and are willing to work hard enough and long enough, and pay all the price. I would as soon spend my life walking the drawn-sword which they say is the bridge to Mahomet’s paradise.’

‘Ah! ah! I fancy I see you doing it. What a figure you’d make, my dear fellow, balancing and posturing on the sword-blade, and making horrid wry faces! Yet I know you’d be as comfortable there as you would in political life. And yet, after all, you are greatly superior to me in every respect. It would be a thousand pities if such a man as you couldn’t have the management of things. But our national ship has to be navigated by second-rate fellows; Jerry-go-nimbles like me, simply because we are good in dodging and turning. But that’s the way. Sharp’s the word, and the sharpest wins.’

‘For my part,’ said Clayton, ‘I shall never be what the world calls a successful man. There seems to be one inscription written over every passage of success in life, as far as I’ve seen. “What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own

I don’t understand you, Clayton.’

Why, it seems to me just this. As matters are going on now in our country, I must either lower my standard of right and honour, and sear my soul in all its nobler sensibilities, or I must be what the world calls an unsuccessful man. There is no path in life, that I know of, where humbuggerj and fraud and deceit are not essential to success—none where a man can make the purity of his moral nature the first object. I see Satan standing in every avenue, saying, "All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

'Why don't you take to the ministry, then, Clayton, at once, and put up a pulpit cushion and big Bible between you and the fiery darts of the devil?'

'I'm afraid I should meet him there, too. I could not gain a right to speak in any pulpit without some profession or pledge to speak this or that that would be a snare to my conscience by-and-by. At the door of every pulpit I must swear always to find truth in a certain formula; and living, prosperity, success, reputation, will all be pledged on my finding it there. I tell you I should, if I followed my own conscience, preach myself out of pulpits quicker than I should plead out at the bar.'

'Lord help you, Clayton! what will you do? Will you settle down on your plantation, and raise cotton, and sell niggers? I'm expecting to hear every minute that you've subscribed for the Liberator, and are going to turn Abolitionist.'

'I do mean to settle down on my plantation, but not to raise cotton or negroes as a chief end of man. I do take the Liberator because I'm a free man, and have a right to take what I have a mind to. I don't agree with Garrison, because I think I know more about the matter, where I stand, than he does or can where he stands. But it's his right, as an honest man, to say what he thinks; and I should use it in his place. If I saw things as he does, I should be an Abolitionist; but I don't.'

'That's a mercy, at least,' said Russel, 'to a man with your taste for martyrdom. But what are you going to do?'

'What any Christian man should do who finds four hundred odd of his fellow men and women placed in a state of absolute dependence on him. I'm going to educate and fit them for freedom. There isn't a sublimer power on earth than God has given to us masters. The law gives us absolute and unlimited control. A plantation, such as a plantation might be, would be "a light to lighten the Gentiles." There is a wonderful and beautiful development locked up in this Ethiopian race, and it is worth being a life-object to unlock it. The raising of cotton is to be the least of the thing. I regard my plantation as a sphere for raising men and women, and demonstrating the capabilities of a race.'

'Selah!' said Russel. Clayton looked angry. 'I beg your pardon, Clayton. This is all superb, sublime! There is just one objection to it. It is wholly impossible.'

'Every good and great thing has been called impossible before it is done.'

'Well, let me tell you, Clayton, just how it will be. You will be a mark for arrows, both sides. You will offend all your neighbours by doing better than they do. You will bring your negroes up to a point in which they will meet the current of the whole community against them, and meanwhile you will get no credit with the abolitionists. They will call you a cut-throat, pirate, sheep-stealer, and all the rest of their elegant little list of embellishments, all the same. You'll get a state of things that nobody can manage but yourself, and you by the hardest; and then you'll die, and it'll all run to the devil faster than you run it up. Now, if you would do the thing by halves, it wouldn't be so bad; but I know you of old. You won't be satisfied with teaching a catechism and a few hymns, parrot-wise, which I think is a respectable religious amusement for our women. You'll teach 'em all to read, and write, and think, and speak. I shouldn't wonder to hear of an importation of black-boards and spelling-books. You'll want a lyceum and debating society. Pray, what does sister Anne say to all this? Anne is a sensible girl now, but I'll warrant you've got her to go in for it.'

'Anne is as much interested as I, but her practical tact is greater than mine, and she is of use in detecting difficulties that I do not see. I have an excellent man, who enters fully into my views, who takes charge of the business interests of the plantation instead of one of these scoundrel overseers. There is to be a graduated system of work and wages introduced—a system that shall teach the nature and rights of property, and train to habits of industry and frugality, by making every man's acquirements equal to his industry and good conduct.'

'And what sort of support do you expect to make out of all this? Are you going to live for them, or they for you?'

'I shall set them the example of living for them, and trust to awaken the good that is in them in return. The strong ought to live for the weak—the cultivated for the ignorant.'

'Well, Clayton, the Lord help you! I'm in earnest now—' fact! Though I know you won't do it, yet I wish you could. It's a pity, Clayton, you were born in this world. It isn't you, but our planet and planetary ways that are in fault. Your mind is a splendid store-house—gold and gems of Ophir—but they are all up in the fifth story, and no staircase to get 'em down into common life. Now, I've just enough appreciation of the sort of thing that's in you not to laugh at you. Nine out of ten would. To tell you the truth, if I were already set up in life, and had as definite a position as you have—family, friends, influence, and means—why, perhaps I might afford to cultivate this style of thing. But I tell you what it is, Clayton, such a conscience as yours is cursedly expensive to keep. It's like a carriage—a fellow mustn't set it up unless he can afford it. It's one of the luxuries.'

'It's a necessary of life with me,' said Clayton, dryly.

'Well, that's your nature. I can't afford it. I've got my way to make. I must succeed, and with your ultra notions I couldn't succeed. So there it is. After all, I can be as religious as dozens of your most respectable men, who, have taken their seats in the night-train for Paradise, and keep the daylight for their own business.'

'I dare say you can.'

'Yes, and I shall get all I aim at; and you, Clayton, will always be an unhappy, dissatisfied aspirant after something too high for mortality. There's just the difference between us.'

The conversation was here interrupted by the return of the family party.

CHAPTER III.

THE CLAYTON FAMILY AND SISTER ANNE.

family party which was now ushered in, consisted of Clay-father, mother, and sister. Judge Clayton was a tall, dignified personage, in whom one recognized, at a glance, the gentleman of the old school. His hair snowy white, formed a singular contrast with the brightness of his blue eyes, whose peculiar acuteness of glance might remind one of a falcon. There was something stately in the position of the head and the carriage of the figure, and a punctilious exactness in the whole air and manner, that gave one a slight impression of sternness. The clear sharp blue of his eye seemed to be that of a calm and decided intellect, of a logical severity of thought; and contrasted with the silvery hair, with that same expression of cold beauty that is given by the contrast of snow mountains cutting into the keen metallic blue of an Alpine sky. One should apprehend much to fear from such a man's reason—little to hope from any outburst of his emotional nature. Yet, as a man, perhaps injustice was done to Judge Clayton by this first impression; for here was, deep beneath this external coldness, a severely-repressed nature, of the most fiery and passionate vehemence. His family affections were strong and tender, seldom manifested in words; but always by the most exact appreciation and consideration for all who came within his sphere. He was strictly and impartially just in all the little minutiae of social and domestic life, never hesitating to speak a truth or acknowledge an error. Mrs. Clayton was a high-bred elderly lady, whose well-preserved delicacy of complexion, brilliant dark eyes, and fine figure, spoke of a youthful beauty. Of a nature imaginative, impulsive, and ardent, inclining constantly to generous extremes, she had thrown herself with passionate devotion round her clear-judging husband, as the Alpine rose girdles with beauty the breast of the bright pure glacier. Between Clayton and his father there existed an affection deep and entire; yet, as the son developed to manhood, it became increasingly evident that they could never move harmoniously in the same practical orbit. The nature of the son was so veined and crossed with that of the mother, that the father, in attempting the age-long and often-tried experiment of making his child an exact copy of himself, found himself extremely puzzled and confused in the operation. Clayton was ideal to an excess; idealism coloured every faculty of his mind, and swayed all his reasonings, as an unseen magnet will swerve the needle. Idealism overruled his conscientiousness, urging him always to rise above the commonly-received and so-called practical in morals. Hence, while he worshipped the theory of law, the practice filled him with disgust; and his father was obliged constantly to point out inefficiencies in reasonings founded more on a keen appreciation of what things ought to be, than on a practical regard to what they Nevertheless, Clayton partook enough of his father's strong steady nature to be his mother's idol, who, perhaps, loved the second rendering of the parental nature with even more tendering tenderness than the first.

Anne Clayton was the eldest of three sisters, and the special companion and confidant of the brother; and, as she stands there untying her bonnet-strings, we must also present her to the reader. She is a little above the medium height, with that breadth and full development of chest which one admires in English women. She carries her well-formed head on her graceful shoulders with a positive, decided air, only a little on this side of haughtiness. Her clear brown complexion reddens into a fine glow in the cheek, giving one the impression of sound perfect health. The positive outline of the small aquiline nose, the large frank well-formed mouth, with its clear rows of shining teeth; the brown eyes, which have caught something of the falcon keenness of the father, are points in the picture by no means to be overlooked. Taking her air altogether, there was an honest frankness about her which encouraged conversation, and put one instantly at ease. Yet no man in his senses could ever venture to take the slightest liberty with Anne Clayton. With all her frankness, there was ever in her manner a perfectly-defined 'thus far shalt thou come, and no further.' Beaux, suitors, lovers in abundance, had stood, knelt, and sighed, protesting, at her shrine. Yet Anne Clayton was twenty-seven, and unmarried. Everybody wondered why; and as to that, we can only wonder with the rest. Her own account of the matter was simple and positive. She did not wish to marry—was happy enough without. The intimacy between the brother and sister had been more than usually strong, notwithstanding marked differences of character; for Anne had not a particle of idealism. Sense she had, shrewdness, and a pleasant dash of humour, withal; but she was eminently what people call a practical girl. She admired highly the contrary of all this in her brother; she delighted in the poetic-heroic element in him, for much the same reason that young ladies used to admire Thaddeus of Warsaw and William Wallace—because it was something quite out of her line. In the whole world of ideas she had an almost idolatrous veneration for her brother; in the sphere of practical operations she felt free to assert, with a certain good-natured positiveness, her own superiority. There was no one in the world, perhaps, whose judgment in this respect Clayton stood more in awe. At the present juncture of affairs, Clayton felt himself rather awkwardly embarrassed in communicating to her an event which she would immediately feel she had a right to know before. A sister of Anne Clayton's positive character, does not usually live twenty-seven years in constant intimacy with a brother like

Clayton, without such an attachment as renders the first announcement of a contemplated marriage somewhat painful. Why, then, had Clayton, who always unreservedly corresponded with his sister, not kept her apprised of his gradual attachment to Nina? The secret of the matter was, that he had had an instinctive consciousness that he could not present Nina to the practical, clear-judging mind of his sister, as she appeared through the mist and spray of his imaginative nature. The hard facts of her case would be sure to tell against her in any communication he might make; and sensitive people never like the fatigue of justifying their instincts. Nothing in fact is less capable of being justified by technical reasons, than those fine insights into character where upon affection is built. We have all had experiences of preferences which would not follow the most exactly-ascertained catalogue of virtues, and would be made captive where there was very little to be said in justification of the captivity. But, meanwhile, rumour, always busy, had not failed to convey to Anne Clayton some suspicions of what was passing; and, though her delicacy and pride forbade any allusion to it, she keenly felt the want of confidence, and of course was not any more charitably disposed towards the little rival for this reason. But now the matter had attained such a shape in Clayton's mind, that he felt the necessity of apprising his family and friends. With his mother the task was made easier by the abundant hopefulness of her nature, which enabled her in a moment to throw herself into the sympathies of those she loved. To her had been deputed the office of first breaking the tidings to Anne, and she had accomplished it during the pleasure-party of the morning. The first glance that passed between Clayton and his sister, as she entered the room, on her return from the party, showed him that he was discomposed and unhappy. She did not remain long in his apartment, or seem disposed to join in conversation; and, after a few abstracted moments, she passed through the open door into the garden, and began to busy herself apparently among her plants. Clayton followed her. He came and stood silently beside her for some time, watching her as she picked the dead leaves off her geranium.

'Mother has told you?' he said at length.

'Yes,' said Anne.

There was a long pause, and Anne picked off dry leaves and green promiscuously, threatening to demolish the bush.

'Anne,' said Clayton, 'how I wish you could see her!'

'I've heard of her,' replied Anne, dryly, 'through the Livingstons.'

'And what have you heard?' said Clayton, eagerly.

'Not such things as I could wish, Edward; not such as I expected to hear of the lady that you would choose.'

'And, pray, what have you heard? Out with it,' said Clayton; 'let's know what the world says of her.'

'Well, the world says,' said Anne, 'that she is a coquette, a flirt, a jilt: from all I've heard, I should think she must be an unprincipled girl.'

'That is hard language, Anne.'

'Truth is generally hard,' replied Anne.

'My dear sister,' said Clayton, taking her hand, and seating her on the seat in the garden, 'have you lost all faith in me?'

'I think it would be nearer truth,' replied Anne, 'to say that you had lost all faith in me. Why am I the last one to know all this? Why am I to hear it first from reports, and every way but from you? Would I have treated you so? Did I ever have anything that I did not tell you? Down to my very soul I've always told you everything!'

'This is true, I own, dear Anne; but what if you had loved some man that you felt sure I should not like? Now, you are a positive person, Anne, and this might happen. Would you want to tell me at once? Would you not, perhaps, wait, and hesitate, and put off, for one reason or another, from day to day, and find it grow more and more difficult, the longer you waited?'

'I can't tell,' said Anne, bitterly. 'I never did love any one better than you, that's the trouble.'

'Neither do I love anybody better than you, Anne. The love I have for you is a whole, perfect thing, just as it was. See if you do not find me every way as devoted. My heart was only opened to take in another love, another wholly different; and which, because it is so wholly different, never can infringe on the love I bear to you. And, Anne, my dear sister, if you could love her as a part of me—'

'I wish I could,' said Anne, somewhat softened; 'but what I've heard has been so unfavourable! She is not, in the least, the person I should have expected you to fancy, Edward. Of all things I despise a woman who trifles with the affections of gentlemen.'

'Well but, my dear, Nina isn't a woman: she is a child—a gay, beautiful, uninformed child, and I'm sure you may apply to her what Pope says :

‘ If to her share some female errors fall,
Look in her face, and you forget them all.’

‘ Yes, indeed,’ said Anne, ‘ I believe all you men are alike—a pretty face bewitches any of you. I thought you were an exception, Edward : but there you are.’

‘ But, Anne, is this the way to encourage my confidence ? Suppose I am bewitched and enchanted, you cannot disentangle me without indulgence. Say what you will about it, the fact is just this—it is my fate to love this child. I’ve tried to love many women before. I have seen many whom I knew no sort of reason why I shouldn’t love : handsomer far, more cultivated, more accomplished ; and yet I’ve seen them without a movement or a flutter of the pulse. But this girl has awakened all there is to me. I do not see in her what the world sees ; I see the ideal image of what she can be, what I am sure she will be, when her nature is fully awakened and developed.’

‘ Just there, Edward—just that,’ said Anne. ‘ You never see anything ; that is, you see a glorified image—a something that might, could, would, or should be—that is your difficulty. You glorify an ordinary boarding-school coquette into something symbolic, sublime ; you clothe her with all your own ideas, and then fall down to worship her.’

‘ Well, my dear Anne, suppose it were so, what then ? I am, as you say, ideal ; you real. Well, be it so ; I must act according to what is in me. I have a right to my nature, you to yours. But it is not every person whom I can idealize. And I suspect this is the great reason why I never could love some very fine women, with whom I have associated on intimate terms ; they had no capacity of being idealised ; they could receive no colour from my fancy ; they wanted, in short, just what Nina has. She is just like one of those little whisking, chattering cascades in the White Mountains, and the atmosphere round her is favourable to rainbows.’

‘ Even so, sister ; but some people I cannot. Why should you find fault with me ? It’s a pleasant thing to look through a rainbow. Why should you seek to disenchant, if I can be enchanted ?’

‘ Why,’ replied Anne, ‘ you remember the man who took his pay of the fairies in gold and diamonds, and after he had passed a certain brook, found it all turned to slate-stones. Now, marriage is like that brook; many a poor fellow finds his diamonds turned to slate on the other side; and this is why I put in my plain hard common sense against your visions. I see the plain facts about this young girl; that she is an acknowledged flirt, a noted coquette and jilt; and a woman who is so is necessarily heartless; and you are too good, Edward, too noble, I have loved you too long, to be willing to give you up to such a woman.'

'There, my dear Anne, there are at least a dozen points in that sentence to which I don't agree. In the first place, as to coquetry, it isn't the unpardonable sin in my eyes—that is, under some circumstances.'

'That is, you mean, when Nina Gordon is the coquette?'

'No, I don't mean that. But the fact is, Anne, there is so little of true sincerity, so little real benevolence and charity, in the common intercourse of young gentlemen and ladies in society, and our sex, who ought to set the example are so selfish and unprincipled in their ways of treating women, that I do not wonder that, now and then, a lively girl, who has the power, avenges her sex by playing off our weak points. Now, I don't think Nina capable of trifling with a real, deep, unselfish, attachment—a love which sought her good, and was willing to sacrifice itself for her; but I don't believe any such has ever been put at her disposal. There's a great difference between a man's wanting a woman to love him, and loving her. Wanting to appropriate a woman as a wife, does not, of course, imply that a man loves her, or that he is capable of loving anything. All these things girls feel, because their instincts are quick; and they are often accused of trifling with a man's heart, when they only see through him, and know he hasn't any. Besides, love of power has always been considered a respectable sin in us men; and why should we denounce a woman for loving her kind of power?'

'O, well, Edward, there isn't anything in the world that you cannot theorize into beauty; but I don't like coquettes, for all that. And then I'm told Nina Gordon is so very odd, and says and does such very extraordinary things sometimes.'

'Well, perhaps that charms me the more. In this conventional world, where women are all rubbed into one uniform surface, like coins in one's pocket, it's a pleasure now and then to find one who can't be made to do and think like all the rest. You have a little dash of this merit yourself, Anne; but you must consider that you have been brought up with mamma, under her influence, trained and guided every hour, even more than you knew. Nina has grown up an heiress among servants, a boarding-school girl in New York; and furthermore you are twenty-seven and she is eighteen, and a great deal may be learned between eighteen and twenty-seven.'

'But, brother, you remember Hannah More says—or some of those good women, I forget who; at any rate it's a sensible saying—"That a man who chooses his wife as he would a picture in a public exhibition-room, should remember that there is this difference, that the picture cannot desire to go back to the exhibition, but the woman may." You have chosen her from seeing her brilliancy in society; but, after all, can you make her happy in the dull routine of a commonplace life? Is she not one of the sort that must have a constant round of company and excitement to keep her in spirits?'

'I think not,' said Clayton; 'I think she is one of those whose vitality is in herself, and one whose freshness and originality will keep life anywhere from being commonplace; and that, living with us, she will sympathise naturally in all our pursuits.'

'Well, now, don't flatter yourself, brother, that you can make his girl over, and bring her to any of your standards.'

'Who, I? Did you think I meditated such an impertinence?' The last thing I should try, to marry a wife to educate her! It's generally one of the most selfish tricks of our sex. Besides I don't want a wife who will be a mere mirror of my opinions and sentiments. I don't want an innocent sheet of blotting-paper, neckly sucking up all I say, and giving a little fainter impressions of my ideas. I want a wife for an alterative; all the vivacities of life lie in differences.'

'Why, surely,' said Anne, 'one wants one's friends to be congenial, I should think.'

'So we do; and there is nothing in the world so congenial as differences. To be sure the differences must be harmonious. In music, now, for instance, one doesn't want a repetition of the same notes, but differing notes that chord. Nay, even discords are indispensable to complete harmony. Now, Nina has just that difference from me which chords with me; and all our little quarrels—for we have had a good many, and I dare say shall have more—are only a sort of chromatic passage—discords of the seventh, leading into harmony. My life is inward, theorizing, self-absorbing. I am hypochondriac—often morbid. The vivacity and acuteness of her outer life makes her just what I need. She wakens, she rouses, and keeps me in play; and her quick instincts are often more than a match for my reason. I reverence the child, then, in spite of her faults. She has taught me many things.'

'Well,' said Anne, laughing, 'I give you up if it comes to that. If you come to talk about reverencing Nina Gordon, I see it's all over with you, Edward, and I'll be good-natured and make the best of it. I hope it may all be true that you think, and a great deal more. At all events, no effort of mine shall be wanting to make you as happy in your new relation as you ought to be.'

'There, now, that's Anne Clayton! It's just like you, sister, and I couldn't say anything better than that. You have unburdened your conscience, you have done all you can for me, and now very properly yield to the inevitable. Nina, I know, will love you; and if you never try to advise her and influence her, you will influence her very much. Good people are a long while learning that, Anne. They think to do good to others by interfering and advising; they don't know that all they have to do is to live. When I first knew Nina, I was silly enough to try my hand that way myself, but I've learned better. Now, when Nina comes to us, all that you and mamma have got to do is just to be kind to her and live as you always have lived, and whatever needs to be altered in her she will alter herself.'

'Well,' said Anne, 'I wish, as it is so, that I could see her.'

'Suppose you write a few lines to her in this letter that I am going to write, and then that will lead in due time to a visit.'

'Anything in the world, Edward, that you say.'

CHAPTER IV.

THE GORDON FAMILY.

A WEEK or two had passed over the head of Nina Gordon since she was first introduced to our readers, and during this time she had become familiar with the details of her home life. Nominally, she stood at the head of her plantation, as mistress and queen in her own right of all, both in doors and out; but, really, she found herself, by her own youth and inexperience, her ignorance of practical details, very much in the hands of those she professed to govern. The duties of a southern housekeeper on a plantation are onerous beyond any amount of northern conception. Every article wanted for daily consumption must be kept under lock and key, and doled out as need arises. For the most part, the servants are only grown-up children, without consideration, forethought, or self-control, quarrelling with each other, and divided into parties and factions, hopeless of any reasonable control. Every article of wear, for some hundreds of people, must be thought of, purchased, cut and made under the direction of the mistress; and add to this the care of young children, whose childish mothers are totally unfit to govern or care for them, and we have some slight idea of what devolves on southern housekeepers. Our readers have seen what Nina was on her return from New York, and can easily imagine that she had no idea of embracing, in good earnest, the hard duties of such a life. In fact, since the death of Nina's mother, the situation of the mistress of the family had been only nominally filled by her aunt, Mrs. Nesbit. The real housekeeper, in fact, was an old mulatto woman, named Katy, who had been trained by Nina's mother. Notwithstanding the general inefficiency and childishness of negro servants, there often are to be found amongst them those of great practical ability. Whenever owners, through necessity or from tact, select such servants, and subject them to the kind of training and responsibility which belongs to a state of freedom, the same qualities are developed which exist in free society. Nina's mother, being always in delicate health, had, from necessity, been obliged to commit much responsibility to 'Aunt Katy,' as she was called; and she had grown up under the discipline into a very efficient housekeeper. With her tall red turban, her jingling bunch of keys, and an abundant sense of the importance of her office, she was a dignitary not likely to be disregarded. It is true that she professed the utmost deference for her young mistress, and very generally passed the compliment of inquiring what she would have done; but it was pretty generally understood that her assent to aunt Katy's propositions was considered as much a matter of course as the queen's to a ministerial recommendation. Indeed, had Nina chosen to demur, her prime minister had the power, without departing in the slightest degree from a respectful bearing, to involve her in labyrinths of perplexity without end. And, as Nina hated trouble, and wanted above all things to have her time to herself for her own amusement, she wisely concluded not to interfere with aunt Katy's reign, and to get by persuasion and coaxing what the old body would have been far too consequential and opinionated to give to authority. In like manner, at the head of all out-door affairs, was the young quadroon, Harry, whom we introduced in the first chapter. In order to come fully at the relation in which he stood to the estate, we must, after the fashion of historians generally, go back a hundred years or so, in order to give our readers a fair start. Behold us, therefore, assuming historic dignity as follows. Among the first emigrants to Virginia, in its colonial days, was one Thomas Gordon, knight, a distant offshoot of the noble Gordon family, renowned in Scottish history. Being a gentleman of some considerable energy, and impatient of the narrow limits of the Old World, where he found little opportunity to obtain that wealth which was necessary to meet the demands of his family pride, he struck off for himself into Virginia. Naturally of an adventurous turn, he was one of the first to propose the enterprise which afterwards resulted in a settlement on the banks of the Chowan River, in North Carolina. Here he took up for himself a large tract of the finest alluvial land, and set himself to the business of planting, with the energy and skill characteristic of his nation; and, as the soil was new and fertile, he soon received a very munificent return for his enterprise. Inspired with remembrances of old ancestral renown, the Gordon family transmitted in their descent all the traditions, feelings, and habits which were the growth of the aristocratic caste from which they sprung. The name of Canema, given to the estate, came from an Indian guide and interpreter, who accompanied the first Colonel Gordon as confidential servant. The estate, being entailed, passed down through the colonial times unbroken in the family, whose wealth for some years seemed to increase with every generation. The family mansion was one of those reproductions of the architectural style of the landed gentry in England, in which, as their means could compass it, the planters were fond of indulging. Carpenters and carvers had been brought over, at expense, from the old country to give the fruits of their skill to the erection; and it was a fancy of the ancestor who built it to lay, in its wood-work, that exuberance of new and rare woods with which the American continent was supposed to abound. He had made an adventurous voyage into South America, and brought from thence specimens of those materials more brilliant than rose-wood, and hard as ebony, which grow so profusely on the banks of the Amazon, that the natives use them for timber. The floor of the central hall of the house was a curiously-inlaid parquet of those brilliant materials, arranged in fine block-work, highly polished. The outside of the house was built in the old Virginian fashion, with two tiers of balconies running completely round, as being much better suited to the American climate than any of European mode. The inside, however, was decorated with sculpture and carvings, copied, many of them, from ancestral residences in Scotland, giving to the mansion an air of premature antiquity. Here, for two or three generations, the Gordon family had lived in opulence. During the time, however, of Nina's father, and still more after his death, there appeared evidently on the place signs of that gradual decay which has conducted many an old Virginian family to poverty and ruin. Slave labour, of all others the most worthless and profitless, had exhausted the first vigour of the soil, and the proprietors gradually degenerated from those habits of energy which were called forth by the necessities of the first settlers, and everything proceeded with that easy abandon in which both master and slave appeared to have one common object—that of proving who should waste with most freedom.

At Colonel Gordon's death, he had bequeathed, as we have already shown, the whole family estate to his daughter, under the care of a servant, of whose uncommon intelligence and thorough devotion of heart he had the most ample proof. When it is reflected that the overseers are generally taken from a class of whites who are often lower in ignorance and barbarism than even the slaves, and that their wastefulness and rapacity are a byword among the planters, it is no wonder that Colonel Gordon thought that, in leaving his plantation under the care of one so energetic, competent, and faithful as Harry, he had made the best possible provision for his daughter. Harry was the son of his master, and inherited much of the temper and constitution of his father, tempered by the soft and genial temperament of the beautiful Eboe mulatress who was his mother. From this circumstance Harry had received advantages of education very superior to what commonly fell to the lot of his class. He had also accompanied his master as valet during the tour of Europe, and thus his opportunities of general observation had been still further enlarged, and that tact by which those of the mixed blood seem so peculiarly fitted to appreciate all the inner aspects of conventional life, had been called out and exercised, so that it would be difficult in any circle to meet with a more agreeable and gentlemanly person. In leaving a man of this character, and his own son, still in the bonds of slavery, Colonel Gordon was influenced by that passionate devotion to his daughter which, with him, overpowered every consideration. A man so cultivated, he argued to himself, might find many avenues opened to him in freedom; might be tempted to leave the estate to other hands, and seek his own fortune. He therefore resolved to leave him bound by an indissoluble tie for a term of years, trusting to his attachment to Nina to make this service tolerable. Possessed of very uncommon judgment, firmness, and knowledge of human nature, Harry had found means to acquire great ascendancy over the hands of the plantation; and, either through fear or through friendship, there was a universal subordination to him. The executors of the estate scarcely made even a feint of overseeing him; and he proceeded, to all intents and purposes, with the perfect ease of a free man. Everybody, for miles around, knew and respected him; and had he not been possessed of a good share of the thoughtful forecasting temperament derived from his Scottish parentage, he might have been completely happy, and forgotten even the existence of the chains whose weight he never felt. It was only in the presence of Tom Gordon—Colonel Gordon's lawful son—that he ever realised that he was a slave. From childhood there had been a rooted enmity between the brothers, which deepened as years passed on; and, as he found himself, on every return of the young man to the place, subjected to taunts and ill-usage, to which his defenceless position left him no power to reply, he had resolved never to marry and lay the foundation for a family, until such time as he should be able to have the command of his own destiny. But the charms of a pretty French quadronee overcame the dictates of prudence.

The history of Tom Gordon is the history of many a young man reared under the institutions and in the state of society which we find him. Nature had endowed him with no mean share of talent, and with that perilous quickness of nervous organization, which, like fire, is a good servant, but a bad master. Out of those elements, with due training, might have been formed an efficient and eloquent public man; but, brought up from childhood among servants, to whom his infant will was law, indulged during the period of infantile beauty and grace in the full expression of every whim, growing into boyhood among slaves with but the average amount of plantation morality, his passions developed at a fearfully early time of life; and before his father thought of sizing the reins of authority, they had gone out of his hands for ever. Tutor after tutor was employed on the plantation to instruct him, and left, terrified by his temper. The secluded nature of the plantation left him without that healthful stimulus of society which is often a help in enabling a boy to come to the knowledge and control of himself. His associates were either the slaves, or the overseers, who are generally unprincipled and artful, or the surrounding whites, who lay in a yet lower depth of degradation. For one reason or another, it was for the interest of all these to flatter his vices, and covertly to assist him in opposing and deceiving his parents. Thus an early age saw him an adept in every low form of vice. In despair he was at length sent to an academy at the North, where he commenced his career on the first day by striking the teacher in the face, and was consequently expelled. Thence he went to another, where, learning caution from experience, he was enabled to maintain his foothold. There he was a successful colporteur and missionary in the way of introducing a knowledge of bowie-knives, revolvers, and vicious literature. Artful, bold, and daring, his residence for a year at a school was sufficient to initiate in the way of ruin perhaps one fourth of the boys. He was handsome, and, when not provoked, good-natured, and had that off-hand way of spending money which passes among boys for generosity. The simple sons of hard-working farmers, bred in habits of industry and frugality, were dazzled and astonished by the freedom with which he talked, and drank, and spit, and swore. He was a hero in their eye, and they began to wonder at the number of things, to them unknown before, which went to make up the necessaries of life. From school he was transferred to college, and there placed under the care of a professor, who was paid an exorbitant sum for overlooking his affairs. The consequence was, that while many a northern boy, whose father could not afford to pay for similar patronage, was disciplined, rusticated, or expelled, as the case might be, Tom Gordon exploited gloriously through college, getting drunk every week, or two, breaking windows, smoking freshmen, heading various sprints in different parts of the country, and at last graduating nobody knew how, except the patron professor, who received an extra sum for the extra difficulties of the case. Returned home, he went into a lawyer's office in Raleigh, where, by a pleasant fiction, he was said to be reading law, because he was occasionally seen at the office during the intervals of his most serious avocations of gambling and horse-racing, and drinking. His father, an affectionate but passionate man, was wholly unable to control him, and the conflicts between them often shook the whole domestic fabric. Nevertheless, to the last Colonel Gordon indulged the old hope, for such cases made and provided, that Tom would get through sowing his wild oats some time, and settle down and be a respectable man; in which hope he left him the half of his property. Since that time, Tom seemed to have studied on no subject except how to accelerate the growth of those wings which riches are said to be inclined to take, under the most favourable circumstances.

As often happens in such cases of utter ruin, Tom Gordon was a much worse character for all the elements of good which he possessed. He had sufficient perception of right, and sufficient conscience remaining, to make him bitter and uncomfortable. In proportion as he knew himself unworthy of his father's affection and trust, he became jealous and angry at any indications of the want of it. He had contracted a settled ill-will to his sister, for no other apparent reason except that the father took a comfort in her which he did not in him. From childhood, it was his habit to vex and annoy her in every possible way; and it was for this reason, among many others, that Harry had persuaded Mr. John Gordon, Nina's uncle and guardian, to place her at the New York boarding-school, where she acquired what is termed an education. After finishing her school career, she had been spending a few months in the family of a cousin of her mother's, and running with loose rein the career of fashionable gaiety. Luckily, she brought home with her unspoiled, a genuine love of nature, which made the rural habits of plantation life agreeable to her. Neighbours there were few. Her uncle's plantation, five miles distant, was the nearest. Other families with whom the Gordons were in the habit of exchanging occasional visits were some ten or fifteen miles distant. It was Nina's delight, however, in her muslin wrapper and straw hat, to patter about over the plantation, to chat with the negroes among their cabins, amusing herself with the various drolleries and peculiarities to which long absence had given the zest of novelty. Then she would call for her pony, and, attended by Harry or some of her servants, would career through the woods, gathering the wild flowers with which they abound, perhaps stop for a day at her uncle's, have a chat and romp with him, and return the next morning. In the comparative solitude of her present life her mind began to clear itself of some former follies, as water when at rest deposits the sediment which clouded it.

Apart from the crowd and the world of gaieties which had dazzled her, she could not help admitting to herself the folly of much she had been doing. Something, doubtless, was added to this by the letters of Clayton. The tone of them, so manly and sincere, so respectful and kind, so removed either from adulation or sentimentalism, had an effect upon her greater than she was herself aware of. So Nina, in her positive and off-hand way, sat down, one day, and wrote farewell letters to both her other lovers, and felt herself quite relieved by the process.

A young person could scarce stand more entirely alone as to sympathetic intercourse with relations than Nina. It is true that the presence of her mother's sister in the family caused it to be said that she was residing under the care of an aunt. Mrs. Nesbit, however, was simply one of those well-bred, well-dressed lay figures whose only office in life seems to be to occupy a certain room in a house, to sit in certain chairs at proper hours, to make certain remarks at suitable intervals of conversation. In her youth this lady had run quite a career as a belle and beauty. Nature had endowed her with a handsome face and figure, and youth and the pleasure of admiration for some years supplied a sufficient flow of animal spirits to make the beauty effective. Early married, she became the mother of several children, who were one by one swept into the grave. The death of her husband, last of all, left her, with a very small fortune, alone in the world, and, like many in similar circumstances, she was content to sink into an appendage to another's family. It is true Mrs. Nesbit considered herself very religious, and as there is a great deal that passes for religion ordinarily, of which she may be fairly considered a representative, we will present our readers with a philosophical analysis of the article. When young, she had thought only of self in the form of admiration and the indulgence of her animal spirits. When married, she had thought of self only in her husband and children, whom she loved because they were hers, and for no other reason. When death swept away her domestic circle, and time stole the beauty and freshness of animal spirits, her self-love took another form; and perceiving that this world was becoming to her somewhat passé, she determined to make the best of her chance for another. Religion she looked upon in the light of a ticket, which being once purchased, and snugly laid away in a pocket-book, is to be produced at the celestial gate, and thus secure admission to heaven. At a certain period of her life, while she deemed this ticket unpurchased, she was extremely low-spirited and gloomy, and went through a quantity of theological reading, enough to have astonished herself had she foreseen it in the days of her belleship. As the result of all, she at last presented herself as a candidate for admission to a Presbyterian church in the vicinity, there professing her determination to run the Christian race. By the Christian race she understood going at stated times to religious meetings, reading the Bible and hymn-book at certain hours in the day, giving, at regular intervals, stipulated sums to religious charities, and preserving a general state of leaden indifference to everybody and everything in the world. She thus fondly imagined that she had renounced the world, because she looked back with disgust on gaieties for which she had no longer strength or spirits. Nor did she dream that the intensity with which her mind travelled the narrow world of self, dwelling on the plaits of her caps, the cut of her stone-coloured satin gowns, the making of her tea and her bed, and the saving of her narrow income, was exactly the same in kind, though far less agreeable in development, as that which once expended itself in dressing and dancing. Like many other apparently negative characters, she had a pertinacious intensity of an extremely narrow and aimless self-will. Her plans of life, small as they were, had a thousand crimps and plaits, to every one of which she adhered with invincible pertinacity. The poor lady little imagined, when she sat with such punctilious satisfaction while the Rev. Mr. Orthodoxy demonstrated that selfishness is the essence of all moral evil, that the sentiment had the slightest application to her, nor dreamed that the little, quiet, muddy current of self-will, which ran without noise or indecorum under the whole structure of her being, might be found, in a future day, to have undermined all her hopes of heaven.

Of course, Mrs. Nesbit regarded Nina and all other lively young people with a kind of melancholy endurance, as shocking spectacles of worldliness. There was but little sympathy, to be sure, in the dashing and outspoken, and almost defiant little Nina and the sombre silver-grey apparition which glided quietly about the wide halls of her paternal mansion. In fact, it seemed to afford the latter a mischievous pleasure to shock her respectable relative on all convenient occasions. Mrs. Nesbit felt it occasionally her duty, as she remarked, to call her lively niece into her apartment, and endeavour to persuade her to read some such volume as Law's Serious Call, or Owen on the One Hundred and Nineteenth Psalm, and to give her a general and solemn warning against all the vanities of the world, in which were generally included dressing in any colour but black and drab, dancing, flirting, writing love-letters, and all other enormities, down to the eating of pea-nut candy. One of these scenes is just now enacting in the good lady's apartment, upon which we will raise the curtain. Mrs. Nesbit, a diminutive, blue-eyed, fair-complexioned little woman, of some five feet in height, sat gently swaying in that respectable asylum for American old age, commonly called a rocking-chair. Every rustle of her silvery silk gown, every fold of the snowy kerchief on her neck, every plait of her immaculate cap, spoke a soul long retired from this world and its cares. The bed, arranged with extremest precision, however, was covered with a melange of French finery, flounces, laces, among which Nina kept up a continual agitation, like that produced by a breeze in a flower-bed, as she unfolded, turned, and fluttered them before the eyes of her relative.

'I have been through all this, Nina,' said the latter, with a melancholy shake of her head, 'and I know the vanity of it.'

'Well, aunty, I haven't been through it, so I don't know.'

'Yes, my dear, when I was of your age, I used to go to balls and parties, and could think of nothing but of dress and admiration. I have been through it all, and seen the vanity of it.'

'Well, aunt, I want to go through it, and see the vanity of it, too. That's just what I'm after. I'm on the way to be as sombre and solemn as you are, but I'm bound to have a good time first. Now, look at this pink brocade.'

Had the brocade been a pall, it could scarcely have been regarded with a more lugubrious aspect.

'Ah, child! such a dying world as this! To spend so much time and thought on dress!'

'Why, aunt Nesbit, yesterday you spent just two whole hours in thinking whether you should turn the breadths of your black silk dress upside down, or down side up; and this was a dying world all the time. Now I don't see that it is any better to think of black silk than it is of pink.' This was a view of the subject which seemed never to have occurred to the good lady. 'But now, aunt, do cheer up, and look at this box of artificial flowers. You know I thought I'd bring a stock on from New York. Now, aren't these perfectly lovely? I like flowers that mean something. Now, these are all imitations of natural flowers, so perfect that you'd scarcely know them from the real. See—there, that's a moss-rose; and now look at these sweet-peas, you'd think they had just been picked; and there—that heliotrope and these jessamines, and those orange blossoms, and that wax camelia—'

'Turn off mine eyes from beholding vanity!' said Mrs. Nesbit, shutting her eyes, and shaking her head.

"What if we wear the richest vest,
Peacocks and flies are better drest;
This flesh, with all its glorious forms,
Must drop to earth, and feed the worms."

'Aunt, I do think you have the most horrid, disgusting set of hymns, all about worms, and dust, and such things!'

'It's my duty, child, when I see you so much taken up with such sinful finery.'

'Why, aunt, do you think artificial flowers are sinful?'

'Yes, dear; they are a sinful waste of time and money, and take off our mind from more important things.'

'Well, aunt, then what did the Lord make sweet-peas, and roses, and orange-blossoms for? I'm sure it's only doing as He does, to make flowers. He don't make everything grey or stone-colour. Now, if you only would come out in the garden this morning, and see the oleanders, and the crape myrtle, and the pinks, the roses, and the tulips, and the hyacinths, I'm sure it would do you good.'

'Oh, I should certainly catch cold, child, if I went out of doors. Milly left a crack opened in the window last night, and I've sneezed three or four times since. It will never do for me to go out in the garden; the feeling of the ground striking up through my shoes is very unhealthy.'

'Well, at any rate, aunt, I should think, if the Lord didn't wish us to wear roses and jessamines, he would not have made them! And it is the most natural thing in the world to want to wear flowers.'

'It only feeds vanity and a love of display, my dear.'

'I don't think it's vanity, or a love of display. I should want to dress prettily if I were the only person in the world. I love pretty things, because they are pretty. I like to wear them because they make me look pretty.'

'There it is, child; you want to dress up your poor perishing body to look pretty, that's the thing.'

'To be sure I do. Why shouldn't I? I mean to look as pretty as I can as long as I live.'

'You seem to have quite a conceit of your beauty,' said aunt Nesbit.

'Well, I know I am pretty. I'm not going to pretend I don't. I like my own looks, now, that's a fact. I'm not like one of your Greek statues, I know. I'm not wonderfully handsome, nor likely to set the world on fire with my beauty. I'm just a pretty little thing; and I like flowers and laces, and all of these things, and I mean to like them, and I don't think [there'll be a bit of religion in my not liking them; and as for all that disagreeable stuff about the worms that you are always telling me, I don't think it does me a particle of good. And, if religion is going to make me so poky, I shall put it off as long as I can.'

'I used to feel just as you do, dear, but I've seen the folly of it.'

'If I've got to lose my love for everything that is bright, everything that is lovely, and everything that is pretty, and like to read such horrid stupid books, why, I'd rather be buried, and done with it!'

'That's the opposition of the natural heart, my dear.'

The conversation was here interrupted by the entrance of a bright, curly-headed mulatto boy, bearing Mrs. Nesbit's daily luncheon.

'Oh, here comes Tomtit,' said Nina. 'Now for a scene! Let's see what he has forgotten now.'

Tomtit was, in his way, a great character in the mansion. He and his mother were the property of Mrs. Nesbit. His true name was no less respectable and methodical than that of Thomas; but, as he was one of those restless and effervescent sprites, who seem to be born for the confusion of quiet people, Nina had rechristened him Tomtit, which soubriquet was immediately recognised by the whole household as being eminently descriptive and appropriate. A constant ripple and eddy of drollery seemed to pervade his whole being; his large, saucy, black eyes had always a laughing fire in them that it was impossible to meet without a smile in return, slave and property though he was; yet the first sentiment of reverence for any created being seemed still wholly unawakened in his curly pate. Breezy, idle, careless, flighty, as his woodland namesake, life seemed to him only a repressed and pent-up ebullition of animal enjoyment; and almost the only excitement of Mrs. Nesbit's quiet life was her chronic controversy with Tomtit. Forty or fifty times a-day did the old body assure him 'that she was astonished at his conduct,' and as many times would he reply by showing the whole set of his handsome teeth on the broad grin, wholly inconsiderate of the state of despair into which he thus reduced her.

On the present occasion, as he entered the room, his eye was caught by the great display of finery on the bed; and hastily dumping the waiter on the first chair that occurred, with a flirt and a spring as lithe as that of a squirrel, he was seated in a moment astride the foot-board indulging in a burst of merriment.

‘Good law, Miss Nina, whar on earth dese yer come from? Good law, some on ’em for me, isn’t ’er?’

‘You see that child now!’ said Mrs. Nesbit, rocking back in her chair with the air of a martyr. ‘After all my talking to him! Nina, you ought not to allow that; it just encourages him!’

‘Tom, get down, you naughty creature you, and get the stand and put the waiter on it. Mind yourself, now!’ said Nina, laughing.

Tomtit cut a somerset from the foot-board to the floor, and, striking up on a very high key, he danced out a small table as if it had been a partner, and deposited it, with a jerk, at the side of Mrs. Nesbit, who aimed a cuff at his ears; but, as he adroitly ducked his head, the intended blow came down upon the table with more force than was comfortable to the inflictor.

“I’ll bet my money on a bob-tail nag,”

‘I believe that child is made of air—I never can hit him!’ said the good lady, waxing red in the face. ‘He is enough to provoke a saint.’

‘So he is, aunt; enough to provoke two saints like you and me. Tomtit, you rogue,’ said she, giving a gentle pull to a handful of his curly hair, ‘be good, now, and I’ll show you the pretty things by-and-by. Come, put the waiter on the table, now; see if you can’t walk for once.’

Casting down his eyes with an irresistible look of mock solemnity, Tomtit marched with the waiter, and placed it by his mistress. The good lady, after drawing off her gloves, and making sundry little decorous preparations, said a short grace over her meal, during which time Tomtit seemed to be holding his sides with repressed merriment; then gravely laying hold of the handle of the teapot, she stopped short, gave an exclamation, and rubbed her fingers, as she felt it almost scalding hot.

‘Laws, missis, dat are hot? O, sure I was tickler to set the nose round to the fire.’

'No you didn't; you stuck the handle right into the fire, as you're always doing!'

'Laws, now—wonder if I did,' said Tomtit, assuming an abstracted appearance. 'Pears as if never can 'member which dem dare is nose and which handle. Now, I's a studdin on dat dare most all the morning—was so,' said he, gathering confidence, as he saw, by Nina's dancing eyes, how greatly she was amused.

'You need a sound whipping, sir—that's what you need!' said Mrs. Nesbit, kindling up in sudden wrath.

'O, I know it,' said Tomtit. 'We's unprofitable servants, all on us. Lord's marcy that we an't 'sumed, all on us!'

Nina was so completely overcome by this novel application of the text which she had heard her aunt laboriously drumming into Tomtit the sabbath before, that she laughed aloud, with rather uproarious merriment.

'O, aunt, there's no use! He don't know anything! He's nothing but an incarnate joke, a walking hoax!'

'No, I doesn't know nothing, Miss Nina,' said Tomtit, at the same time looking out from under his long eyelashes. 'Don't know nothing at all—never can.'

'Well now, Tomtit,' said Mrs. Nesbit, drawing out a little blue cow-hide from under her chair, and looking at him resolutely, 'you see, if this teapot handle is hot again, I'll give it you! Do you hear?'

'Yes, missus,' said Tomtit, with that indescribable sing-song of indifference, which is so common and so provoking in his class.

'And, now, Tomtit, you go down stairs and clean the knives for dinner.'

'Yes, missus,' said he, pirouetting towards the door. And once in the passage; he struck up a vigorous,

'O, I'm going to glory,— Won't you go along with me?'

accompanying himself, by slapping his own sides, as he went down two stairs at a time.

"Going to glory!" said Mrs. Nesbit, rather shortly; 'he looks like it, I think! It's the third or fourth time that that child has blistered my fingers with this teapot, and I know he does it on purpose! So ungrateful, when I spend my time, teaching him, hour after hour, labouring with him so! I declare, I don't believe these children have got any souls!'

‘Well, aunt, I declare, I should think you’d get out of all patience with him; yet he’s so funny, I cannot, for the life of me, help laughing.’

Here a distant whoop on the staircase, and a tempestuous chorus to a Methodist hymn, with the words, announced that Tomtit was on the return; and very soon, throwing open the door, he marched in, with an air of the greatest importance.

‘Tomtit, didn’t I tell you to go and clean the knives?’

‘Law, missis, come up here to bring Miss Nina’s love-letters,’ said he, producing two or three letters. ‘Good law, though,’ said he, checking himself, ‘forgot to put them on a waity!’ And, before a word could be said, he was out of the room and down stairs, and at the height of furious contest with the girl who was cleaning the silver, for a waiter to put Miss Nina’s letters on. ‘Dar, Miss Nina,’ appealing to her when she appeared, ‘Rosa won’t let me have no waity!’

‘Well,’ said Tomtit, looking after her with great solemnity, ‘missis in de right on’t. An’t no kind of order in this here house, ’pite of all I can do. One says put letters on waity. Another won’t let you have waity to put letters on. And, finally, Miss Nina, she pull them all away. Just de way things going on in dis yer house, all the time! I cant help it; done all I can. Just the way, missis says.’

There was one member of Nina’s establishment of a character so marked, that we cannot refrain from giving her a separate place in our picture of her surroundings,—and this was Milly, the waiting-woman of aunt Nesbit. Aunt Milly, as she was commonly called, was a tall, broad-shouldered, deep-chested African woman, with a fulness of figure approaching to corpulence. Her habit of standing and of motion was peculiar and majestic, reminding one of the Scripture expression ‘upright as the palm-tree.’ Her skin was of a peculiar blackness and softness, not unlike black velvet. Her eyes were large, full, and dark, and had about them that expression of wishfulness and longing which one may sometimes have remarked in dark eyes. Her mouth was large, and the lips, though partaking of the African fulness, had nevertheless, something decided and energetic in their outline, which was still further seconded by the heavy moulding of the chin. A frank smile, which was common with her, disclosed a row of most splendid and perfect teeth. Her hair, without approaching to the character of the Anglo-Saxon, was still different from the ordinary woolly coat of the negro, and seemed more like an infinite number of close-knotted curls, of brilliant, glossy blackness. The parents of Milly were prisoners taken in African wars; and she was a fine specimen of one of those warlike and splendid races, of whom, as they have seldom been reduced to slavery, there are but few and rare specimens among the slaves of the south. Her usual head-dress was a high turban, of those brilliant-coloured Madras handkerchiefs in which the instinctive taste of the dark races leads them to delight. Milly's was always put on and worn with a regal air, as if it were the coronet of the queen. For the rest, her dress consisted of a well-fitted gown of dark stuff, of a quality somewhat finer than the usual household apparel; a neatly-starched white muslin handkerchief folded across her bosom, and a clean white apron, completed her usual costume. No one could regard her, as a whole, and not feel their prejudice in favour of the exclusive comeliness of white races somewhat shaken. Placed among the gorgeous surroundings of African landscape and scenery, it might be doubted whether any one's taste could have desired, as a completion to her appearance, to have blanched her glossy skin, whose depth of colouring harmonized so well with the intense and fiery glories of a tropical landscape.

In character, Milly was worthy of her remarkable external appearance. Heaven had endowed her with a soul as broad and generous as her ample frame. Her passions rolled and burned in her bosom with a tropical fervour; a shrewd and abundant mother-wit, united with a vein of occasional drollery, gave to her habits of speech a quaint vivacity. A native adroitness gave an unwonted command over all the functions of her fine body; so that she was endowed with that much-coveted property which the New Englander denominates 'faculty,' which means the intuitive ability to seize at once on the right and best way of doing everything which is to be done. At the same time, she was possessed of that high degree of self-respect which led her to be incorruptibly faithful and thorough in all she undertook; less, as it often seemed, from any fealty or deference to those whom she served, than from a kind of native pride in well-doing, which led her to deem it beneath herself to slight or pass over the least thing which she had undertaken. Her promises were inviolable. Her owners always knew that what she once said would be done, if it were within the bounds of possibility. The value of an individual thus endowed in person and character, may be easily conceived by those who understand how rare, either among slaves or freemen, is such a combination. Milly was, therefore, always considered in the family as a most valuable piece of property, and treated with more than common consideration. As a mind, even when uncultivated, will ever find its level, it often happened that Milly's amount of being, and force of character gave her ascendancy even over those who were nominally her superiors. As her ways were commonly found to be the best ways, she was left, in most cases, to pursue them without opposition or control. But, favourite as she was, her life had been one of deep sorrows. She had been suffered, it is true, to contract a marriage with a very finely-endowed mulatto man, on a plantation adjoining her owner's, by whom she had a numerous family of children, who inherited all her fine physical and mental endowments. With more than usual sensibility and power of reflection, the idea that the children so dear to her were, from their birth not her own—that they were from the first hour of their existence, merchantable articles, having a fixed market-value in proportion to every excellence, and liable to all the reverses of merchantable goods,—sank with deep weight into her mind. Unfortunately, the family to which she belonged being reduced to poverty, there remained, often, no other means of making up the deficiency of income than the annual sale of one or two negroes. Milly's children, from their fine developments, were much-coveted articles. Their owner was often tempted by extravagant offers for them, and therefore, to meet one crisis or another of family difficulties, they had been successively sold from her. At first, she had met this doom with almost the ferocity of a lioness; but the blow, oftentimes repeated, had brought with it a dull endurance, and Christianity had entered, as it often does with the slave, through the rents and fissures of a broken heart. Those instances of piety which are sometimes, though rarely, found among slaves, and which transcend the ordinary development of the race, are generally the results of calamities and sorrows so utterly desolating as to force the soul to depend on God alone. But where one soul is thus raised to higher piety, thousands are crushed in hopeless imbecility.

CHAPTER V.

HARRY AND HIS WIFE.

SEVERAL miles from the Gordon estate, on an old and somewhat decayed plantation, stood a neat log-cabin, whose external aspect showed both taste and care. It was almost enveloped in luxuriant wreaths of yellow jessamine, and garlanded with a magnificent Lamarque rose, whose cream-coloured buds and flowers, contrasted beautifully with the dark polished green of the finely-cut leaves. The house stood in an enclosure formed by a high hedge of the American holly, whose evergreen foliage and scarlet berries made it at all times of the year a beautiful object. Within the enclosure was a garden, carefully tended, and devoted to the finest fruits and flowers. This little dwelling, so different in its air of fanciful neatness from ordinary southern cabins, was the abode of Harry's little wife. Lisette, which was her name, was the slave of a French Creole woman, to whom a plantation had recently fallen by inheritance. She was a delicate, airy little creature, formed by a mixture of the African and French blood, producing one of those fanciful, exotic combinations, that gives the same impression of brilliancy and richness that one receives from tropical insects and flowers. From both parent races she was endowed with a sensuous being exquisitely quick and fine, a nature of everlasting childhood, with all its freshness of present life, all its thoughtless, unreasoning fearlessness of the future. She stands there at her ironing-table, just outside her cottage door, singing gaily at her work. Her round, plump, childish form is shown to advantage by the trim blue basque, laced in front, over a chemisette of white linen. Her head is wreathed with a gay turban, from which escapes now and then a wandering curl of her silky black hair. Her eyes, as she raises them, have the hazy dreamy languor which is so characteristic of the mixed races. Her little childish hands are busy, with nimble fingers, adroitly plaiting and arranging various articles of feminine toilet, too delicate and expensive to have belonged to those in humble circumstances. She ironed, plaited, and sung, with busy care. Occasionally, however, she would suspend her work, and, running between the flower borders to the hedge, look wistfully along the road, shading her eyes with her hand. At last, as she saw a man on horseback approaching, she flew lightly out, and ran to meet him.

‘Harry, Harry! You’ve come at last. I’m so glad! And what have you got in that paper? Is it anything for me?’

He held it up and shook it at her, while she leaped after it.

‘No, no, little curiosity!’ he said, gaily.

‘I know it’s something for me,’ said she, with a pretty, half-pouting air.

‘And why do you know it’s for you? Is everything to be for you in the world, you little good-for-nothing?’

‘Good-for-nothing!’ with a toss of the gaily turbaned little head. ‘You may well say that, sir! Just look at the two dozen shirts that I’ve ironed since morning! Come, now, take me up. I want to ride.’

Harry put out the toe of his boot and his hand, and with an adroit spring, she was in a moment before him, on his horse’s neck, and, with a quick turn, snatched the paper parcel from his hand.

‘Woman’s curiosity!’ said he.

‘Well, I want to see what it is. Dear me, what a tight string! O, I can’t break it! Well, here it goes. I’ll tear a hole in it, anyhow. O silk, as I live! Aha! tell me now isn’t this for me, you bad thing, you!’

‘Why, how do you know it isn’t to make me a summer coat?’

‘Summer coat!—likely story! Aha! I’ve found you out, mister! But come, do make the horse canter! I want to go fast, make him canter, do!’

Harry gave a sudden jerk to the reins, and in a minute the two were flying off as if on the wings of the wind. On and on they went, through a small coppice of pines, while the light-hearted laugh rang on the breeze behind them. Now they are lost to view. In a few minutes, emerging from the pine woods in another direction, they came sweeping, gay and laughing, up to the gate. To fasten the horse, to snatch the little wife on his shoulder, and run into the cottage with her, seemed the work only of a moment; and, as he set her down, still laughing, he exclaimed,

‘There, go now, for a pretty little picture as you are! I have helped them get up les tableaux vivans at their great houses, but you are my tableau. You aren’t good for much. You are nothing but a humming-bird, made to live on honey!’

‘That’s what I am?’ said the little one. ‘It takes a great deal of honey to keep me. I want to be praised, flattered, and loved, all the time. It isn’t enough to have you love me. I want to hear you tell me so every day, and hour, and minute, and I want you always to admire me, and praise everything that I do. Now—'

'Particularly when you tear holes in packages!' said Harry.

'O my silk—my new silk dress!' said Lisette, thus reminded of the package which she held in her hand. 'This hateful string! How it cuts my fingers! I will break it! I'll bite it in two. Harry, Harry, don't you see how it hurts my fingers? Why don't you cut it?' And the little sprite danced about the cottage floor, tearing the paper, and tugging at the string like an enraged humming-bird.

Harry came laughing behind her, and taking hold of her two hands, held them quite still, while he cut the string of the parcel, and unfolded a gorgeous plaid silk—crimson, green, and orange.

'There, now, what do you think of that? Miss Nina brought it when she came home last week.'

'O, how lovely! Isn't she a beauty? Isn't she good? How beautiful it is! Dear me, dear me! How happy I am! How happy we are! aren't we, Harry?'

A shadow came over Harry's forehead as he answered, with a half sigh,

'Yes.'

'I was up at three o'clock this morning on purpose to get all my ironing done to-day, because I thought you were to come home to-night. Ah! Ah! you don't know what a supper I've got ready! You'll see, by and by. I'm going to do something uncommon. You mustn't look in that other room, Harry; you mustn't!

'Mustn't I?' said Harry, getting up, and going to the door.

'There now! who's curiosity now, I wonder!' said she, springing nimbly between him and the door. 'No, you shan't go in, though; there now, don't, don't! Be good now, Harry!'

'Well, I may as well give up first as last. This is your house, not mine, I suppose,' said Harry.

'Mr. Submission, how meek we are, all of a sudden! Well, while the fit lasts, you go to the spring and get me some water to fill this tea-kettle. Off with you, now, this minute! Mind you don't stop to play by the way!'

And while Harry is gone to the spring, we will follow the wife to the forbidden room. Very cool and pleasant it is, with its white window-curtains, its matted floor, and displaying in the corner that draped feather-bed, with its ruffled pillows and fringed curtains, which it is the great ambition of the southern cabin to attain and maintain. The door, which opened on to a show of most brilliant flowers, was overlaid completely by the Lamarque rose we have before referred to ; and large clusters of its creamy blossoms, and wreaths of its dark-green leaves, had been enticed in and tied to sundry nails and pegs by the small hands of the little mistress to form an arch of flowers and roses. A little table stood in the door, draped with a spotless damasked table-cloth, fine enough for the use of a princess, and only produced by the little mistress on festive occasions. On it were arranged dishes curiously trimmed with moss and vine-leaves, which displayed strawberries and peaches, with a pitcher of cream and one of whey, small dishes of curd, delicate cakes and biscuit, and fresh golden butter. After patting and arranging the table-cloth, Lisette tripped gaily around, and altered here and there the arrangement of a dish, occasionally stepping back, and cocking her little head on one side, much like a bird, singing gaily as she did so ; then she would pick a bit of moss from this, and a flower from that, and retreat again, and watch the effect.

‘How surprised he will be!’ she said to herself. Still humming a tune in a low gurgling under tone, she danced hither and thither, round the apartment. First she gave the curtains a little shake, and, unlooping one of them, looped it up again, so as to throw the beams of the evening sun on the table.

‘There, there, there! how pretty the light falls through those nasturitums! I wonder if the room smells of the mignonette: I gathered it when the dew was on it, and they say that will make it smell all day. Now, there’s Harry’s book-case. Dear me, these flies! How they do get on to everything! Shoo! Shoo! now, now!’ and catching a gay bandana handkerchief from the drawer, she perfectly exhausted herself in flying about the room in pursuit of the buzzing intruders, who soared, and dived, and careered, after the manner of flies in general, seeming determined to go anywhere but out of the door, and finally were seen brushing their wings and licking their feet with great alertness, on the very topmost height of the sacred bed-curtains; and as just this moment a glimpse was caught of Harry returning from the spring, Lisette was obliged to abandon the chase, and rush into the other room, to prevent a premature development of her little tea-tableau. Then a small, pug-nosed, black tea-kettle came on to the stage of action from some unknown cupboard; and Harry had to fill it with water, and of course spilt the water on to the ironing-table, which made another little breezy, chattering commotion, and then the flat-irons were cleared away, and the pug-nosed kettle reigned in their stead on the charcoal brazier.

‘Now, Harry, was ever such a smart wife as I am? Only think, besides all the rest that I’ve done, I’ve ironed your white linen suit, complete! Now, go put it on. Not in there! not in there!’ she said, pushing him away from the door. ‘You can’t go there yet. You’ll do well enough out here.’ And away she went, singing through the garden walks; and the song floating back behind her, seemed like an odour brushed from the flowers. The refrain came rippling in at the door—

“Me think not what to-morrow bring;
Me happy, so me sing!”

‘Poor little thing!’ said Harry to himself; ‘why should I try to teach her anything?’

In a few minutes she was back again, her white apron over her arm, and blossoms of yellow jessamine, spikes of blue lavender, and buds of moss-roses, peeping out from it. She skipped guily along, and deposited her treasure on the ironing-table; then with a zealous, bustling earnestness, which characterized everything she did, she began sorting them into two bouquets, alternately talking and singing, as she did so,

“Come on ye rosy hours,
All joy and gladness bring!”

‘You see, Harry, you’re going to have a bouquet to put into the button-hole of that coat. It will make you look so handsome! There now, there now:

“We’ll strew the way with flowers,
And merrily, merrily sing.”

Suddenly stopping, she looked at him archly, and said—

‘You can’t tell now what I’m doing all this for!’

‘Do hear him talk—so pompous! Well, sir, it’s for your birthday, now. Aha! you thought, because I can’t keep the day of the month, that I didn’t know anything about it; but I did. And I have put down now a chalk-mark every day for four weeks, right under where I keep my ironing account, so as to be sure of it. And I’ve been busy about it ever since two o’clock this morning. And now—there, the tea-kettle is boiling!’ and away she flew to the door. 'Oh, dear me! dear me, now! I've killed myself, now, I have!' she cried, holding up one of her hands, and flinging it up in the air. 'Dear me! who knew it was so hot!'

'I should think a little woman that is so used to the holder might have known it,' said Harry, as he caressed the little burnt hand. 'Come, now, let me carry it for you,' said Harry, 'and I'll make the tea, if you'll let me go into that mysterious room.'

'Indeed, no, Harry. I'm going to do everything myself;' and forgetting the burnt finger, Lisette was off in a moment, and back in a moment, with a shining teapot in her hand, and the tea was made. And at last the mysterious door opened, and Lisette stood with her eyes fixed upon Harry to watch the effect.

'Superb! magnificent! splendid! Why, this is good enough for a king! And where did you get all these things?' said Harry.

'Oh, out of our garden, all but the peaches. Those old Mist gave me; they come from Florida. There, now, you laughed at ~~me~~ last summer when I set those strawberry vines, and made all sorts of fun of me. And what do you think now?'

'Think! I think you're a wonderful little thing—a perfect witch.'

'Come, now, let's sit down then; you there, and I here.' And, opening the door of the bird-cage, which hung in the Lamarque rose-bush, 'Little Button shall come too.'

Button, a bright yellow canary, with a smart black tuft upon his head, seemed to understand his part in the little domestic scene perfectly: for he stepped obediently upon the finger which was extended to him, and was soon sitting quite at his ease on the mossy edge of one of the dishes, pecking at the strawberries.

'And now, do tell me,' said Lisette, 'all about Miss Nina. How does she look?'

'Pretty and smart as ever,' said Harry; 'just the same witchy, wilful ways with her.'

'And did she show you her dresses?'

'Oh, yes, the whole.'

'Oh, do tell me about them, Harry—do!'

'Well, there's a lovely pink gauze, covered with spangles, to be worn over white satin.'

'With flounces?' said Lisette, earnestly.

'With flounces.'

'How many?'

'Really I don't remember.'

‘Don’t remember how many flounces? Why, Harry, how stupid! Say, Harry, don’t you suppose she will let me come and look at her things?’

‘Oh, yes, dear, I don’t doubt she will; and that will save me making a gazette of myself.’

‘Oh, when will you take me there, Harry?’

‘Perhaps to-morrow, dear. And now,’ said Harry, ‘that you have accomplished your surprise upon me, I have a surprise, in return, for you. You can’t guess, now, what Miss Nina brought for me.’

‘No, indeed. What?’ said Lisette, springing up; ‘do tell me—quick!’

‘Patience—patience,’ said Harry, deliberately fumbling in his pocket, amusing himself with her excited air. But who should speak the astonishment and rapture which widened Lisette’s dark eyes when the watch was produced? She clapped her hands, and danced for joy, to the imminent risk of upsetting the table, and all the things on it.

‘I do think we are the most fortunate people, you and I, Harry. Everything goes just as we want it to—doesn’t it now?’ Harry’s assent to this comprehensive proposition was much less fervent than suited his little wife. ‘Now, what’s the matter with you? What goes wrong? Why don’t you rejoice as I do?’ said she, coming and seating herself down upon his knee. ‘Come, now, you’ve been working too hard, I know. I’m going to sing to you, now; you want something to cheer you up.’ And Lisette took down her banjo, and sat down in the doorway under the arch of Lamarque roses, and began thrumming gaily. ‘This is the nicest little thing this banjo!’ she said; ‘I wouldn’t change it for all the guitars in the world. Now, Harry, I’m going to sing something specially for you.’ And Lisette sung:

“What are the joys of white man, here,
What are his pleasures, say?
He great, he proud, he haughty fine,
While I my banjo play:
He sleep all day, he wake all night;
He full of care, his heart no light;
He great deal want, he little get;
He sorry, so he fret.

“Me envy not the white man here,
Though he so proud and gay;
He great, he proud, he haughty fine,
While I my banjo play:

Me work all day, me sleep all night ;
Me have no care, me heart is light ;
Me think not what to-morrow bring ;
Me happy, so me sing."

Lisette rattled the strings of the banjo, and sang with such a hearty abandon of enjoyment that it was a comfort to look at her. One would have thought that a bird's soul put into a woman's body would have sung just so.

'There,' she said, throwing down her banjo, and seating herself on her husband's knee, 'do you know I think you are like white man in the song. I should like to know what is the matter with you. I can see plain enough when you are not happy; but I don't see why.'

Oh, Lisette, I have very perplexing business to manage,' said Harry. 'Miss Nina is a dear, good little mistress, but she doesn't know anything about accounts or money; and here she has brought me home a set of bills to settle, and I'm sure I don't know where the money is to be got from. It's hard work to make the old place profitable in our days. The ground is pretty much worked up; it doesn't bear the crops it used to. And then our people are so childish, they don't a soul of them care how much they spend, or how carelessly they work. It's very expensive keeping up such an establishment. You know the Gordons must be Gordons. Things can't be done now as some other families would do them; and then those bills which Miss Nina brings from New York are perfectly frightful.'

'Well, Harry, what are you going to do?' said Lisette, nestling down close on his shoulder. 'You always know how to do something.'

'Why, Lisette, I shall have to do what I've done two or three times before—take the money that I have saved to pay these bills—our freedom money, Lisette.'

'Oh, well, there, don't worry. We can get it again, you know. Why, you know, Harry, you can make a good deal with your trade, and one thing and another that you do; and then, as for me, why, you know, my ironing and my muslins how celebrated they are! Come, don't worry one bit; we shall get on nicely.'

'Ah, but, Lisette, all this pretty house of ours, garden and everything, is only built on air, after all, till we are free. Any accident can take it from us. Now, there's Miss Nina; she is engaged, she tells me, to two or three lovers as usual.'

‘Engaged, is she?’ said Lisette, eagerly, female curiosity getting the better of every other consideration; ‘she always did have lovers, just, you know, as I used to.’

‘Yes, but Lisette, she will marry, some time, and what a thing that would be for you and me. On her husband will depend all my happiness for all my life. He may set her against me; he may not like me. O, Lisette! I’ve seen trouble enough coming of marriages; and I was hoping, you see, that before that time came the money for my freedom would all be paid in, and I should be my own man; but, now, here it is. Just as the sum is almost made up, I must pay out five hundred dollars of it, and that throws us back two or three years longer. And what makes me feel most anxious is, that I’m pretty sure Miss Nina will marry one of these lovers before long.’

‘Why, what makes you think so, Harry?’

‘O I’ve seen girls before now, Lisette, and I know the signs.’

‘What does she do? what does she say? tell me now, Harry.’

‘O, well, she runs on abusing the man, after her sort; and she’s so very earnest and positive in telling me she don’t like him.’

‘Just the way I used to do about you, Harry, isn’t it?’

‘Besides,’ said Harry, ‘I know by the kind of character she gives of him, that she thinks of him very differently from what she ever did of any man before. Miss Nina little knows, when she is rattling about her beaux, what I’m thinking of. I’m saying, all the while, to myself, “Is that man going to be my master?” and this Clayton, I’m very sure, is going to be my master.’

‘Well, isn’t he a good man?’

‘She says he is; but there’s never any saying what good men will do, never. Good men think it right sometimes to do the strangest things. This man may alter the whole agreement between us; he will have a right to do it, if he is her husband; he may refuse to let me buy myself; and then all the money that I’ve paid will go for nothing.’

‘But, certainly, Harry, Miss Nina will never consent to such a thing!’

‘Lisette, Miss Nina is one thing, but Mrs. Clayton may be quite another thing. I’ve seen all that, over and over again. I tell you, Lisette, that we who live on other people’s looks and words, we watch and think a great deal! Ah! we come to be very sharp, I can tell you. The more Miss Nina has liked me, the less her husband may like me; don’t you know that?’

'No, Harry; you don't dislike people I like.'

'Child, child, that's quite another thing.'

'Well, then, Harry, if you feel so bad about it, what makes you pay this money for Miss Nina? She don't know anything about it; she don't ask you to. I don't believe she would want you to, if she did know it. Just go and pay it in, and have your freedom papers made out. Why don't you tell her all about it?'

'No, I can't, Lisette. I've had the care of her all her life, and I've made it as smooth as I could for her, and I won't begin to trouble her now. Do you know, too, that I'm afraid that, perhaps, if she knew all about it, she wouldn't do the right thing. There's never any knowing, Lisette. Now, you see, I say to myself, "Poor little thing! she doesn't know anything about accounts, and she don't know how I feel! But, if I should tell her, and she shouldn't care, and act as I've seen women act, why, then, you know, I couldn't think so any more. I don't believe she would, mind you; but then I don't like to try.'

'Harry, what makes you love her so much?'

'Don't you know, Lisette, that Master Tom was a dreadful bad boy, always wilful and wayward, almost broke his father's heart; and he was always ugly and contrary to her? I'm sure I don't know why; for she was a sweet little thing, and she loves him now, ugly as he is; and he is the most selfish creature I ever saw. And as for Miss Nina, she isn't selfish; she is only inconsiderate. But I've known her do for him, over and over, just what I do for her, giving him her money and jewels to help him out of a scrape. But, then, to be sure it all comes upon me, at last, which makes it all the more aggravating. Now, Lisette, I'm going to tell you something, but you mustn't tell anybody. Nina Gordon is my sister!'

'Harry!'

'Yes, Lisette, you may well open your eyes,' said Harry, rising involuntarily; 'I'm Colonel Gordon's oldest son! Let me have the comfort of saying it once, if I never do again.'

'Harry, who told you?'

'He told me, Lisette—he, himself, told me, when he was dying, and charged me always to watch over her; and I have done it! I never told Miss Nina; I wouldn't have her told for the world. It wouldn't make her love me; more likely it would turn her against me. I've seen many a man sold for nothing else than looking too much like his father, or his brothers and sisters.

I was given to her, and my sister and my mother went out to Mississippi, with Miss Nina's aunt.'

'I never heard you speak of this sister, Harry; was she pretty?'

'Lisette, she was beautiful, she was graceful, and she had real genius. I've heard many singers on the stage that could not sing, with all their learning, as she did by nature.'

'Well, what became of her?'

'O, what becomes of such women always, among us! Nursed and petted, and caressed; taught everything elegant, nothing solid. Why, the woman meant well enough that had the care of her, Mrs. Stewart, Colonel Gordon's sister, but she couldn't prevent her son's wanting her, and taking her, for his mistress; and when she died there she was.'

'Well.'

'When George Stewart had lived with her two or three years, he was taken with small-pox. You know what perfect horror that always creates. None of his white acquaintances and friends would come near his plantation; the negroes were all frightened to death, as usual; overseer ran off. Well, then Cōra Gordon's blood came up; she nursed him all through that sickness. What's more, she had influence to keep order on the place; got the people to getting the cotton-crops themselves, so that when the overseer came sneaking back, the things hadn't all gone to ruin, as they might have done. Well, the young fellow had more in him than some of them; for when he got well he left his plantation, took her up to Ohio, and married her, and lived with her there.'

'Why didn't he live with her on his plantation?' said Lisette.

'He couldn't have freed her there; it's against the laws. But, lately I've got a letter from her, saying that he had died, and left to her and her son all his property on the Mississippi.'

'Why, she will be rich, won't she?'

'Yes, if she gets it; but there's no knowing how that will be. There are fifty ways of cheating her out of it, I suppose. But, now, as to Miss Nina's estate; you don't know how I feel about it. I was trusted with it, and trusted with her. She never has known, more than a child, where the money came from, or went to; and it shan't be said that I've brought the estate in debt, for the sake of getting my own liberty. If I have one pride in life, it is to give it up to Miss Nina's husband in good order. But, then the trouble of it, Lisette—the trouble of getting anything like decent work from these creatures; the ways that I have to turn and twist to get round them, and manage them, to get anything done! They hate me; they are jealous of me, Lisette! I'm just like the bat in the fable; I'm neither bird nor beast. How often I've wished that I was a good, honest black nigger, like uncle Pomp! Then I should know what I was; but, now, I'm neither one thing nor another. I come just near enough to the condition of the white to look into it, to enjoy it, and want everything that I see. Then, the way I've been educated makes it worse. The fact is, that when the fathers of such as we feel any love for us, it isn't like the love they have for their own white children. They are half ashamed of us; they are ashamed to show their love, if they have it; and, then, there's a kind of remorse and pity about it, which they make up to themselves by petting us. They load us with presents and indulgences; they amuse themselves with us while we are children, and play off all our passions as if we were instruments to be played on. If we show talent and smartness, we hear some one say, aside, "It's rather a pity, isn't it?" or, "He is too smart for his place." Then, we have all the family blood, and the family pride; and what to do with it? I feel that I am a Gordon. I feel in my very heart that I'm like Colonel Gordon—I know I am; and, sometimes, I know I look like him, and that's one reason why Tom Gordon always hated me: and, then, there's another thing—the hardest of all—to have a sister like Miss Nina; to feel she is my sister, and never dare to say a word of it! She little thinks, when she plays and jokes with me, sometimes, how I feel. I have eyes and senses; I can compare myself with Tom Gordon. I know he never would learn anything at any of the schools he was put to; and I know that when his tutors used to teach me, how much faster I got along than he did. And yet he must have all the position, and all the respect! and, then, Miss Nina so often says to me, by way of apology, when she puts up with his ugliness, "Ah! well, you know, Harry, he is the only brother I have got in the world!" Isn't it too bad? Colonel Gordon gave me every advantage of education, because I think he meant me for just this place which I fill. Miss Nina was his pet. He was wholly absorbed in her, and he was frightened at Tom's wickedness; and so he left me, bound to the estate in this way, only stipulating that I should buy myself on favourable terms, before Miss Nina's marriage. She has always been willing enough. I might have taken any and every advantage of her inconsiderateness. And Mr. John Gordon has been willing, too, and has been very kind about it, and has signed an agreement as guardian, and Miss Nina has signed it too, that in case of her death, or whatever happened, I'm to have my freedom on paying a certain sum; and I have got his receipts for what I have paid; so that's tolerably safe. Lisette, I had meant never to have been married till I was a free man; but, somehow, you bewitched me into it. I did very wrong.'

'O, pshaw! pshaw!' interrupted Lisette; 'I ain't going to hear another word of this talk. What's the use? We shall do well enough. Everything will come out right—you see if it don't, now. I was always lucky, and I always shall be.'

The conversation was here interrupted by a loud whooping, and a clatter of horse's heels.

'What's that?' said Harry, starting to the window. 'As I live, now, if there isn't that wretch of a Tomtit, going off with that horse! How came he here? He will ruin him! Stop there! hallo!' he exclaimed, running out of doors after Tomtit. Tomtit, however, only gave a triumphant whoop, and disappeared among the pine-trees.

'Well, I should like to know what sent him here!' said Harry, walking up and down much disturbed.

'O, he is only gone round through the grove; he will be back again,' said Lisette, 'never fear. Isn't he a handsome little rogue?'

'Lisette, you never can see trouble anywhere!' said Harry, almost angrily.

'Ah, yes I do,' said Lisette; 'when you speak in that tone! Please don't, Harry! What should you want me to see trouble for?'

'I don't know, you little thing!' said Harry, stroking her head fondly.

'Ah, there comes the little rascal, just as I knew he would!' said Lisette. 'He only wanted to take a little race; he hasn't hurt the horse;' and, tripping lightly out, she caught the reins, just as Tomtit drove up to the gate; and it seemed but a moment before he was over in the garden, with his hands full of flowers.

'Stop, there, you young rascal, and tell me what sent you here!' said Harry, seizing him, and shaking him by the shoulder.

'Laws, Massa Harry, I wants to get peaches, like other folks,' said the boy, peeping roguishly through the window, at the tea-table.

'And he shall have a peach, too,' said Lisette, 'and some flowers, if he'll be a good boy, and not tread on my borders.'

Tomtit seized greedily at the peach she gave him, and sitting flat down where he stood, and throwing the flowers on the ground beside him, began eating it with an earnestness of devotion, as if his whole being were concentrated in the act. The colour was heightened in his brown cheeks by the exercise, and, with his long drooping curls and eyelashes, he looked a very pretty centre to the flower-piece which he had so promptly improvised.

'Ah! how pretty he is!' said Lisette, touching Harry's elbow. 'I wish he was mine.'

'You'd have your hands full, if he was,' said Harry, eying the intruder discontentedly; while Lisette stood picking the hulls from a fine bunch of strawberries which she was ready to give him when he had finished his peach.

'Beauty makes fools of all you girls,' said Harry, cynically.

'Is that the reason I married you?' said Lisette archly. 'Well, I know I could make him good if I had the care of him. Nothing like coaxing, is there, Tom?'

'I'll boun' there an't,' said Tom, opening his mouth for the strawberries, with much the air of a handsome saucy robin.

'Well,' said Harry, 'I should like to know what brought him over here. Speak, now, Tom, were n't you sent with some message?'

'O laws, yes,' said Tom, getting up, and scratching his curly head. 'Miss Nina sent me. She want you to get on dat ar horse, and make tracks for home like split foot. She done got letters from two or three of her beaux, and she is dancing and tearing round there real awful. She done got scared specs; feared they'd all come together.'

'And sent you on a message, and you haven't told me all this time,' said Harry, making a motion as though he was going to box the child's ears; but the boy glided out of his hands as if he had been water, and was gone, vanishing among the shrubbery of the garden; and while Harry was mounting his horse, he reappeared on the roof of the little cabin, caricoling and dancing, shouting at the topmost of his voice—

"Away down old Virginy Dere I bought a yellow girl for a guinea."

'I'll give it to you, some time,' said Harry, shaking his fist at him.

'No he won't, either,' cried Lisette, laughing. 'Come down here, Tomtit, and I'll make a good boy of you.'

CHAPTER VI.

THE DILEMMA.

IN order to understand the occasion which hurried Harry home, we must go back to Canema. Nina, after taking her letters from the hands of Tomtit, as we have related, ran back with them into Mrs. Nesbit's room, and sat herself down to read them. As she read, she evidently became quite excited and discomposed, crumpling a paper with her little hand, and tapping her foot impatiently on the carpet.

'There, now, I'm sure I don't know what I shall do, aunt Nesbit,' addressing her aunt, because it was her outspoken habit to talk to anybody or anything which happened to be sitting next to her. 'I've got myself into a pretty scrape now.'

'I told you you'd get into trouble one of these days.'

'O, you told me so! If there's anything I hate it is to have any body tell me, "I told you so." But now, aunt, really I know I've been foolish, but I don't know what to do. Here are two gentlemen coming together that I would not have meet each other here for the world; and I don't know really, what I had better do.'

'You'd better do just as you please, as you always do, and always would, ever since I knew you,' said aunt Nesbit, in a calm indifferent tone,

'But really, aunt, I don't know what is proper to do in such a case.'

'Your and my notions of propriety, Nina, are so different, that I don't know how to advise you. You see the consequences now of not attending to the advice of your friends. I always knew these flirtations of yours would bring you into trouble.' And aunt Nesbit said this with that quiet satisfied air with which precise elderly people so often edify their thoughtless young friends under difficulties.

'Well, I didn't want a sermon, now, aunt Nesbit; but as you've seen a great deal more of the world than I have, I thought you might help me a little, just to tell me whether it would not be proper for me to write and put one of these gentlemen off, or make some excuse for me, or something. I'm sure I never kept house before. I don't want to do anything that don't seem hospitable, and yet I don't want them to come together. Now, there, that's flat.'

There was a long pause, in which Nina sat vexed and coloring, biting her lips, and nestling uneasily in her seat. Mrs. Nesbit looked calm and considerate, and Nina began to hope that she was taking the case a little to heart. At last the good old lady looked up and said, very quietly,—

'I wonder what time it is!'

Nina thought she was debating the expediency of sending some message, and therefore she crossed the room with great alacrity to look at the old clock in the entry.

'It's half-past two, aunt.' And she stood with her lips apart, looking at Mrs. Nesbit for some suggestion.

'I was going to tell Rosa,' said she, abstractedly, 'that that onion in the stuffing does not agree with me. It rose on my stomach all yesterday morning; but it's too late now.'

Nina actually stamped with anger.

'Aunt Nesbit, you are the most selfish person I ever saw in my life!'

'Nina, child, you astonish me!' said aunt Nesbit, with her wonted placidity. 'What's the matter?'

'I don't care,' said Nina; 'I don't care a bit! I don't see how people can be so. If a dog should come to me and tell me he was in trouble, I think I should listen to him, and show some kind of interest to help him. I don't care how foolish anybody has been; if they are in trouble, I'd help them if I could; and I think you might think enough of it to give me some little advice.'

'O, you are talking about that affair yet,' said her aunt; 'why I believe I told you I didn't know what to advise, didn't I? Shouldn't give way to this temper, Nina; it's very unladylike, besides being sinful. But, then, I don't suppose it's any use for me to talk.'

And aunt Nesbit, with an abused air, got up, walked quietly to the looking-glass, took off her morning cap, unlocked her drawer and laid it in, took out another, which Nina could not see differed a particle from the last, held it up thoughtfully on her hand, and appeared absorbed in the contemplation of it; while Nina, swelling with a mixture of anger and mortification, stood regarding her as she leisurely picked out each bow, and finally, with a decorous air of solemnity, arranged it upon her head; patting it tenderly down.

'Aunt Nesbit,' she said, suddenly, as if the words hurt her, 'I ‘Think I spoke improperly, and I’m very sorry for it. I beg your pardon.’

‘O, it’s no matter, child; I didn’t care about it. I’m pretty well used to your temper.’

Bang went the door, and in a moment Nina stood in the entry, shaking her fist at it with impotent wrath.

‘You stony, stiff, disagreeable old creature! how came you ever to be my mother’s sister?’ And with the word mother she burst into a tempest of tears, and rushed violently to her own chamber. The first object that she saw was Milly, arranging some clothes in her drawer, and to her astonishment Nina rushed up to her, and throwing her arms round her neck, sobbed and wept in such multitudes of excitement that the good creature was alarmed.

‘Laws bless my soul, ye dear little lamb! what’s the matter? Why, don’t, don’t, honey! Why, bless de dear little soul! bless de dear precious lamb! who’s been a hurting of it?’ And at each word of endearment Nina’s distress broke out afresh, and she sobbed so bitterly that the faithful creature really began to be frightened. ‘Laws, Miss Nina, I hope dere an’t nothing happened to you now.’

‘No, no, nothing, Milly, only I am lonesome, and I want my mother! I haven’t got any mother! Dear me!’ she said, with a fresh burst.

‘Ah, de poor thing!’ said Milly, compassionately, sitting down, and fondling Nina in her arms as if she had been a baby. ‘Poor chile! Laws, yes; I ’member your ma was a beautiful woman!’

‘Yes,’ said Nina, speaking between her sobs, ‘the girls at school had mothers. And there was Mary Brooks, she used to read to me her mother’s letters, and I used to feel so, all the while, to think nobody wrote such letters to me! And there’s Aunt Nesbit—I don’t care what they say about her being religious: she is the most selfish, hateful creature I ever did see! I do believe, if I were lying dead and laid out in the next room to her, she would be thinking what she’d get next for dinner.’

‘O, don’t my poor lamb, don’t!’ said Milly, compassionately.

‘Yes, I will, too! She’s always taking it for granted that I’m the greatest sinner on the face of the earth! She don’t scold me, she don’t care enough about me to scold! she only takes it for granted, in her hateful, quiet way, that I’m going to destruction, and that she can’t help it and don’t care. Supposing I’m not good, what's to make me good? Is it going to make me good for people to sit up so stiff, and tell me they always knew I was a fool, and a flirt, and all that? Milly, I've had dreadful turns of wanting to be good, and I've laid awake nights and cried because I wasn't good; and what makes it worse is, that I think if ma was alive, she could help me. She wasn't like aunt Nesbit, was she, Milly?

'No, honey, she was'nt. I'll tell you about your ma, some time, honey.'

'The worst of it is,' said Nina, 'when aunt Nesbit speaks to me in her hateful way, I get angry; then I speak in a way that isn't proper, I know. O, if she only would get angry with me back again! or if she'd do anything in the world but stand still, in her still way, telling me she is astonished at me! That's a lie, too, for she never was astonished at anything in her life! She has'nt life enough to be!'

'Ah, Miss Nina, we mustn't 'spect more of folks than dere is in them.'

'Expect? I don't expect.'

'Well, bless you, honey, when you knows what folks is, don't let's worry. Ye can't fill a quart cup out of a thimble, honey, no way you can fix it. Dere's just where 'tis. I knowed your ma, and I's knowed Miss Loo, ever since she was a girl. 'Pears like they wern't no more alike than snow is like sugar. Miss Loo, when she was a girl, she was dat pretty that everybody was wonder'ing after her; but to de love dat ar went arter your ma. Couldn't tell why it was, honey. 'Peared like Miss Loo wan't techy, nor she wan't one of your bursting out sort, scolding round. 'Peared like she'd never hurt nobody; and yet our people, they could'nt none of dem bar her. 'Peared like nobody did nothing for her with a will.'

'Well, good reason!' said Nina, 'she never did anything for anybody else with a will! She never cared for anybody! Now, I'm selfish; I always knew it. I do a great many selfish things; but it's a different kind from hers. Do you know, Milly, she don't seem to know she is selfish? There she sits rocking in her old chair, so sure she's going straight to heaven, and don't care whether anybody else gets there or not.'

'O laws, now Miss Nina, you're too hard on her. Why, look how patient she sits with Tomtit, teaching him his hymns and verses.'

'And you think that's because she cares anything about him?

Do you know she thinks he isn't fit to go to heaven, and that if he dies he'll go to the bad place? And yet, if he was to die to-morrow, she'd talk to you about clear-starching her caps! No wonder the child don't love her! She talks to him just as she does to me; tells him she don't expect anything of him—she knows he'll never come to any good; and the little wretch has got it by heart, now. Do you know that, though I get in a passion with Tom, sometimes, and though I am sure I should perish sitting boring with him over those old books, yet I really believe I care more for him than she does? And he knows it, too. He sees through her as plain as I do. You'll never make me believe that aunt Nesbit has got religion. I know there is such a thing as religion; but she hasn't got it. It isn't all being sober, and crackling old stiff religious newspapers, and boring with texts and hymns, that makes people religious. She is just as worldly-minded as I am, only it's in another way. There now, I wanted her to advise me about something, to-day. Why, Milly, all girls want somebody to talk with: and if she'd only showed the least interest in what I said, she might scold and lecture me as much as she'd a mind to. But, to have her not even hear me! And when she must have seen that I was troubled and perplexed, and wanted somebody to advise me, she turned round so cool, and began to talk about the onions and the stuffing! Got me so angry! I suppose she is in her room now, rocking, and thinking what a sinner I am!

'Well, now, Miss Nina, 'pears though you've talked enough about dat ar; 'pears like it won't make you feel no better.'

'Yes it does make me feel better! I had to speak to somebody, Milly, or else I should have burst; and now I wonder where Harry is. He always could find a way for me out of anything.'

'He is gone over to see his wife, I think, Miss Nina.'

'O, too bad! Do send Tomtit after him, right away. Tell him that I want him to come right home this very minute—Something very particular. And, Milly, you just go and tell Old Hundred to get out the carriage and horses, and I'll go over and drop a note in the post-office myself. I won't trust it to Tomtit; for I know he'll lose it.'

'Miss Nina,' said Milly, looking hesitatingly, 'I 'spect you don't know how things go about round here; but de fact is, Old Hundred has got so kind of curous, lately, dere can't nobody do nothing with him, 'cept Harry. Don't 'tend to do nothing

Miss Loo tells him to. I's feared he'll make up some story or other about de horses; but he won't get 'em out—now mind, I tell you, chile!

'He won't! I should like to know if he won't, if I tell him to! A pretty story that would be! I'll soon teach him that he has a live mistress. Somebody quite different from aunt Loo!'

'Well, well, chile, perhaps you'd better go. He wouldn't mind me, I know. Maybe he'll do it for you.'

'O, yes; I'll just run down to his house, and hurry him up.'

And Nina, quite restored to her usual good humour, tripped gaily across to the cabin of Old Hundred, that stood the other side of the house. Old Hundred's true name was, in fact, John, but he had derived the appellation by which he was always known, from the extreme moderation of all his movements. Old Hundred had a double share of that profound sense of the dignity of his office, which is an attribute of the tribe of coachmen in general. He seemed to consider the horses and carriage as a sort of family ark, of which he was the high priest, and which it was his business to save from desecration. According to his own showing, all the people on the plantation, and indeed the whole world in general, were in a state of habitual conspiracy against the family carriage and horses, and he was standing for them, single handed, at the risk of his life. It was as much part of his duty, in virtue of his office, to show cause, on every occasion, why the carriage should not be used, as it is for state attorneys to undertake prosecutions. And it was also a part of the accomplishment of his situation to conduct his refusal in the most decorous manner; always showing that it was only the utter impossibility of the case which prevented. The available grounds of refusal Old Hundred had made a life-study, and had always a store of them cut and dried for use, all ready at a moment's notice. In the first place there were always a number of impossibilities with regard to the carriage. Either 'it was muddy, and he was laying out to wash it;' or else 'he had washed it and couldn't have it splashed;' or 'he had taken out the back curtain, and had laid out to put a stitch in it, one of dese yer days;' or there was something the matter with the irons. 'He reckoned they was a little bit sprung.' He 'lowed he'd ask the blacksmith about it, some of these yer times.' And, then, as to the horses, the possibilities were rich and abundant. What with the strains, and loose shoes, and stones getting in at the hoofs, dangers of all sorts of complaints, for which he had his own vocabulary of names, it was next to an impossibility, according to any ordinary rule of computing chances, that the two should be in complete order together.

Utterly ignorant, however, of the magnitude of the undertaking which she was attempting, and buoyant with the consciousness of authority, Nina tripped singing along, and found Old Hundred tranquilly reclining in his tent door, watching through his half-shut eyes, while the afternoon sunbeam irradiated the smoke which rose from the old pipe between his teeth. A large, black, one-eyed crow sat perching with a quizzical air upon his knee; and when he heard Nina's footstep approaching, cocked his remaining eye towards her with a smart, observing attitude, as if he had been deputed to look out for applications while his master dozed. Between this crow, who had received the soubriquet of uncle Jeff, and his master, there existed a most particular bond of friendship and amity. This was further strengthened by the fact that they were both equally disliked by all the inhabitants of the place. Like many people who are called to stand in responsible positions, Old Hundred had rather failed in the humble virtues, and become dogmatical and dictatorial to that degree that nobody but his own wife could do anything with him. And as to Jeff, if the principle of thieving could be incarnate, he might have won a temple among the Lacedemonians.

In various skirmishes and battles consequent on his misdeeds, Jeff had lost an eye, and had a considerable portion of the feathers scalded off one side of his head; while the remaining ones, discomposed by the incident, ever after stood up in a protesting attitude, imparting something still more sinister to his goblin appearance. In another rencounter he had received a permanent twist in the neck, which gave him always the appearance of looking over his shoulder, and added not a little to the oddity of the general effect. Uncle Jeff thieved with an assiduity and skill which were worthy of a better cause; and when not upon any serious enterprise of this kind, employed his time in pulling up corn, scratching up newly-planted flower-seeds, tangling yarn, pulling out knitting needles, pecking the eyes of sleeping people, scratching and biting children, and any other little miscellaneous mischief which occurred to him. He was invaluable to Old Hundred, because he was a standing apology for any and all discoveries made on his premises, of things which ought not to have been there. No matter what was brought to light—whether spoons from the great house, or a pair of sleeve buttons, or a handkerchief, or a pipe from a neighbouring cabin—Jeff was always called up to answer. Old Hundred regularly scolded on these occasions, and declared he was enough to 'spile the character of any man's house.' And Jeff would look at him comically over the shoulder, and wink his remaining eye, as much as to say that the scolding was a settled thing between them, and that he wasn't going to take it at all in ill part.

'Uncle John,' said Nina, 'I want you to get the carriage out for me right away. I want to take a ride over the cross-run.'

'Laws bless your sweet face, honey, chile, I's dreadful sorry; but you can't do it dis yer day.'

'Can't do it! why not?'

'Why, bless you, chile, it ain't possible, no way. Can't have the carriage and hosses dis yer artemnoon.'

'But I must go over to cross-run to the post-office. I must go this minute.'

'Law, chile, you can't do it, fur you can't walk, and it's sartin you can't ride, because dese yer hosses, nor dis yer carriage, can't stir out dis yer artemnoon; no way you can fix it. Mout go, perhaps, to-morrow, or next week.'

'Oh, uncle John, I don't believe a word of it. I want them this afternoon, and I say I must have them.'

'No, you can't, chile,' said Old Hundred, in a tender, condescending tone, as if he was speaking to a baby. 'I tell you dat ar is impossible. Why, bless your soul, Miss Nina, de curtains is all off de carriage!'

'Well, put them on again, then.'

'Ah, Miss Nina, dat ar an't all. Pete was desperate sick last night; took with the thumps powerful bad. Why, Miss Nina, he was dat sick I had to be up with him most all night.' And while Old Hundred adroitly issued this little work of fiction, the raven nodded waggishly at Nina, as much as to say, 'You hear that fellow, now!'

Nina stood quite perplexed, biting her lips, and Old Hundred seemed to go into a profound slumber.

'I don't believe but what the horses can go to-day. I mean to go and look.'

'Laws, honey, chile, ye can't now; de dors is all locked, and I'se got de key in my pocket. Every one of dem critturs would have been killed forty times over fore now. I think everybody in dis yer world is arter dem dare critturs. Miss Loo, she's wanting 'em to go one way, and Harry's allers usin' de critturs. Got one out dis yer arternoon, riding over to see his wife. Don't see no use in his ridin' round so grand, no way. Laws, Miss Nina, your pa used to say to me, says he, "Uncle John, you knows more about dem critturs dan I do; and now I tell you what it is, uncle John, you take care of dem critturs; don't you let nobody kill 'em for nothing." Now, Miss Nina, I's always walking in the steps of the colonel's 'rections. Now, good, clar bright weather, over good roads, I likes to trot the critturs out. Dat ar is reasonable. But, den, what roads is over the cross run, I want to know? Dem dere roads is de most mis'ablest things you ever did see. Mud! Hi! ought for to see de mud down dar by de creek. Why, de bridge all tared off! Man drowned in dat dar creek once! Was so! It an't no sort of road for young ladies to go over, tell you, Miss Nina; why don't you let Harry carry your letter over? If he must be ridin' round de country, don't see why he couldn't do some good wid his ridin'. Why, de carriage wouldn't get over before ten o'clock dis yer night! Now, mine, I tell you. Besides, it's gwine for to rain. I's been feeling dat ar in my corns all dis yer morning: and Jeff he's been acting like the bery debil hisself—de way he always does 'fore it rains. Never knowed dat ar sign to fail.

'The short of the matter is, uncle John, you are determined not to go,' said Nina. 'But I tell you you shall go!—there, now. Now, do you get up immediately; and get out those horses.'

Old Hundred still sat quiet, smoking; and Nina, after reiterating her orders till she got thoroughly angry, began at last to ask herself the question how she was going to carry them into execution. Old Hundred appeared to have descended into himself in a profound reverie, and betrayed not the smallest sign of hearing anything she said. 'I wish Harry would come back quick,' she said to herself, as she pensively retraced her steps through the garden; but Tomtit had taken the commission to go for him in his usual leisurely way, spending the greater part of the afternoon on the road.

'Now, an't you ashamed of yourself, you mean old nigger!' said aunt Rose, the wife of Old Hundred, who had been listening to the conversation, 'talking 'bout de creek, and de mud, and de critturs, and lor knows what all, when we all knows it's nothing but your laziness!'

'Well,' said Old Hundred, 'and what would come o' the critturs if I wasn't lazy, I want to know? Laziness! it's the bery best thing for the critturs, can be. Where'd dem horses a been now, if I had been one of your highfelutin sort, always driving round? Where'd dey a been, and what would dey a been, hey? Who wants to see hosses all skin and bone? Lord! if I had been like some o' de coachmen, de buzzards would have had the picking of dem critturs, long ago!

'I rally believe that you've told dem dar lies till you begin to believe them yourself!' said Rose. 'Telling our dear, sweet young lady, about your being up with Pete all night, when de Lord knows you laid here snoring fit to tar de roof off!'

"Well, must say something! Folks must be 'spectful to de ladies. Course I couldn't tell her I wouldn't take de critturs out; so I just trots out 'scuse. Ah! lots of dem 'scuses I keeps! I tell you, now, 'scuses is excellent things. Why, 'scuses is like dis yer grease, that keeps de wheels from screaming. Lord bless you, de whole world turns round on 'scuses. Whar de world be if everybody was such fools to tell the raal reason for everything they are gwine fur to do, or an't gwine fur to?"

CHAPTER VII.

CONSULTATION.

'O, HARRY, I'm so glad to see you back! In such trouble as I've been to-day! Don't you think, this very morning, as I was sitting in aunt Nesbit's room, Tomtit brought up these two letters; and one of them is from Clayton, and the other from Mr. Carson; and, now, see here what Clayton says: "I shall have business that will take me in your vicinity next week; and it is quite possible, unless I hear from you to the contrary, that you may see me at Canema next Friday or Saturday." Well, then, see here; there's another from Mr. Carson, that hateful Carson! Now, you see he hasn't got my letter; says he is coming; what impudence! I'm tired to death of that creature, and he'll be here just as certain! Disagreeable people always do keep their promises. He'll certainly be here!'

'Well, Miss Nana, you recollect you said you thought it would be good fun.'

'O, Harry, don't bring that up, I beg of you! The fact is, Harry, I've altered my mind about that. You know I've put a stop to all those foolish things at once, and am done with them. You know I wrote to Carson and Emmons, both, that my sentiments had changed, and all that sort of thing, that the girls always say. I'm going to dismiss all of 'em at once, and have no more fooling.'

'What, all? Mr. Clayton and all?'

'Well, I don't know exactly,—no. Do you know, Harry, I think his letters are rather improving; at least, they are different letters from any I've got before; and, though I don't think I shall break my heart after him, yet I like to get them. But the other two I'm sick to death of; and as for having that creature boring round here, I won't! At any rate, I don't want him and Clayton here together. I wouldn't have them together for the world; and I wrote a letter to keep Carson off, this morning, and I've been in trouble all day. Everybody has plagued me. Aunt Nesbitt only gave me one of her mopy lectures about flirting, and wouldn't help me in the least. And, then, Old Hundred—I wanted him to get out the carriage and horses, for me to go over and put this letter in the office, and I never saw such a creature in my life! I can't make him do anything! I should like to know what the use is of having servants, if you can't get anything done!'

'O, as to Old Hundred, I understand him, and he understands me,' said Harry. 'I never find any trouble with him; but he is a provoking old creature. He stands very much on the dignity of his office. But, if you want your letter carried to-night, I can contrive a safer way than that, if you'll trust it to me.'

'Ah! well, do take it!'

'Yes,' said Harry, 'I'll send a messenger across on horse-back, and I have means to make him faithful.'

'Well, Harry, Harry!' said Nina, catching at his sleeve as he was going out, 'come back again, won't you? I want to talk to you.'

During Harry's absence, our heroine drew a letter from her bosom, and read it over. 'How well he writes!' she said to herself. 'So different from the rest of them! I wish he'd keep away from here—that's what I do. It's a pretty thing to get his letters, but I don't think I want to see him. O, dear! I wish I had somebody to talk to about it. Aunt Nesbitt is so cross! I can't—no, I won't care about him! Harry is a kind soul. Ah! Harry, have you sent the letter?' said she, eagerly, as he entered. 'I have, Miss Nina; but I can't flatter you too much. I'm afraid it's too late for the mail—though there's never any saying when the mail goes out, within two or three hours.'

'Well, I hope it will stay for me, once. If that stupid creature comes, why, I don't know what I shall do! He's so presuming! and he'll squeak about with those horrid shoes of his; and then, I suppose it will all come out, one way or another; and I don't know what Clayton will think.'

'But I thought you didn't care what he thought.'

'Well, you know he's been writing to me all about his family. There's his father, is a very distinguished man, of a very old family: and he's been writing to me about his sister—the most dreadfully sensible sister he has got—good, lovely, accomplished, and pious! O, dear me! I don't know what in the world he ever thought of me for. And, do you think, there's a postscript from his sister, written elegantly as can be!'

'As to family, Miss Nina,' said Harry, 'I think the Gordons can hold up their heads with anybody; and, then, I rather think you'll like Miss Clayton.'

'Ah! but then, Harry, this talking about fathers and sisters; it's bringing the thing awfully near! It looks so much, you know, as if I really were caught. Do you know, Harry, I think I'm just like my pony. You know, she likes to have you come, and offer her corn, and stroke her neck; and she likes to make you believe she is going to let you catch her; but when it comes to putting a bridle on her, she's off in a minute. Now, that's the way with me. It's rather exciting, you know, these beaux and love-letters, and talking sentiment, going to the opera, and taking rides on horseback, and all that. But when men get to talking about their fathers, and their sisters, and to act as if they were sure of me, I'm just like Sylfine—I want to be off. You know, Harry, I think it's a very serious thing, this being married. It's dreadful! I don't want to be a woman-grown, I wish I could always be a girl, and live just as I have lived, and have plenty more girls come and see me and have fun. I haven't been a bit happy lately—not a bit; and I never was unhappy before in my life.'

'Well, why don't you write to Mr. Clayton, and break it all off, if you feel so about it?'

'Well, why don't I? I don't know. I've had a great mind to do it; but I'm afraid I should feel worse than I do now. He's coming like a great dark shadow over my life, and everything is beginning to feel so real to me! I don't want to take up life in earnest. I read a story, once, about Undine; and, do you know, Harry, I think I feel just as Undine did, when she felt her soul coming in her.'

'And is Clayton Knight Heldebound?' said Harry, smiling.

'I don't know. What if he should be? Now, Harry, you see the fact is that sensible men get their heads turned by such kind of girls as I am; and they pet us, and humour us. But, then, I'm afraid they're thinking, all the while, that their turn to rule is coming by-and-by. They marry us, because they think they are going to make us over; and what I'm afraid of is, I never can be made over. Don't think I was cut out right in the first place; and there never will be much more of me than there is now. And he'll be comparing me with his pattern sister; and I shan't be any the more amiable for that. Now, his sister is what folks call highly educated, you know, Harry. She understands all about literature, and everything. As for me, I've just cultivation enough to appreciate a fine horse—that's the extent. And yet I'm proud. I wouldn't wish to stand second, in his opinion, even to his sister. So, there it is. That's the way with us girls. We are always wanting what we know we ought not to have, and are not willing to take the trouble to get.'

'Miss Nina, if you'll let me speak my mind out frankly, now, I want to offer one piece of advice. Just be perfectly true and open with Mr. Clayton; and, if he and Mr. Carson should come together, just tell him frankly how the matter stands. You are a Gordon, and they say truth always runs in the Gordon blood; and now, Miss Nina, you are no longer a school-girl, but a young lady at the head of the estate.'

He stopped and hesitated.

'Well, Harry, you needn't stop. I understand you—got a few grains of sense left, I hope, and haven't got so many friends that I can afford to get angry with you for nothing.'

'I suppose,' said Harry, thoughtfully, 'that your aunt will be well enough to be down to table. Have you told her how matters stand?'

'Who? Aunt Loo? Catch me telling her anything! No, Harry, I've got to stand all alone. I haven't any mother, and I haven't any sister; and aunt Loo is worse than nobody, because it's provoking to have somebody round that you feel might take an interest, and ought to, and don't care a red cent for you. Well, I declare, if I'm not much, if I'm not such a model as Miss Clayton; there—how could any one expect it, when I have just come up by myself, first at the plantation here, and then at that French boarding-school? I tell you what, Harry, boarding-schools are not what they're cried up to be. It's good fun, no doubt, but we never learnt anything there. That is to say, we never learnt it internally, but had it just rubbed on to us outside. A girl can't help, of course, learning something; and I've learnt just what I happened to like and couldn't help, and a deal that isn't of the most edifying nature besides.'

'Well! we shall see what will come!'

CHAPTER VIII.

OLD TIFF.

'I SAY, Tiff, do you think he will come, to-night?'

'Laws, laws, Missis, how can Tiff tell? I's been a gazin' out de do.' Don't see nor hear nothin.'

'It's so lonesome! So lonesome! and the night's so long!'

And the speaker, an emaciated, feeble little woman, turned herself uneasily on the ragged pallet where she was lying, and twirling her slender fingers nervously, gazed up at the rough unplastered beams above. The room was of the coarsest and rudest casts. The hut was framed of rough pine logs, filled between the crevices with mud and straw; the floor made of rough split planks, unevenly jointed together; the window was formed by some single panes arranged in a row where a gap had been made in one of the logs. At one end was a rude chimney of sticks, where smouldered a fire of pine cones and brushwood, covered over with a light coat of white ashes. On the mantle over it was a shelf, which displayed sundry vials, a cracked teapot, and tumbler, some medicinal-looking packages, a turkey's wing, much abridged, and defaced by frequent usage, some bundles of dry herbs, and lastly, a gaily-painted mug of coarse crockery-containing a bunch of wild flowers. On pegs, driven into the logs, were arranged different articles of female attire, and silvers, little coats, and dresses, which belonged to smaller wearers, with now and then soiled and coarse articles of man's apparel.

The woman, who lay upon a coarse chaff pallet in the corner, was one who once might have been pretty. Her skin was fair, her hair soft and curling, her eyes of a beautiful blue, her hands thin and transparent as pearl. But the deep dark circles under the eyes, the thin white lips, the attenuated limbs, the hurried breathing, and the burning spots in the cheek, told that, whatever she might have been, she was now not long for this world. Beside her bed was sitting an old negro, in whose close curling wool, age had begun to sprinkle flecks of white. His countenance presented, physically, one of the most uncomely specimens of negro features; and would have been positively frightful, had it not been redeemed by an expression of cheerful kindness which beamed from it. His face was of ebony blackness, with a wide upturned nose, a mouth of portentous size, guarded by clumsy lips, revealing teeth which a shark might have envied. The only fine feature was his large, black eyes, which, at the present, were concealed by a huge pair of plated spectacles, placed very low upon his nose, and through which he was directing his sight upon a child's stocking, that he was busily darning. At his foot was a rude cradle made of a gum-tree log, hollowed out into a trough, and wadded by various old fragments of flannel, in which slept a very young infant. Another child, of about three years of age, was sitting on the negro's knee, busily playing with some pine cones and mosses. The figure of the old negro was low and stooping; and he wore, pinned round his shoulders, a half handkerchief, or shawl of red flannel, arranged much as an old woman would have arranged it. One or two needles, with coarse black thread dangling to them, were stuck in on his shoulder; and, as he busily darned on the little stocking, he kept up a kind of drooping intermixture of chanting, and talking to the child on his knee. 'So, ho, Teddy!—bub dar!—My man! Sit still!—'cause yer ma's sick, and sister's gone for medicine. Dar, Tiff 'll sing to his little man.

' Christ was born in Bethlehem,
Christ was born in Bethlehem,
And in a manger laid.'

'Take care, dar! dat ar needle scratch you little finger!—poor little fingers! Ah, be still now!—play wid you pretty tings, and see what yer pa 'll bring ye!'

'O, dear me!—well!' said the woman on the bed, 'I shall give up!'

'Bress de Lord, no, missis!' said Tiff, laying down the stocking, and holding the child to him with one hand, while the other was busy in patting and arranging the bedclothes. 'No use in givin' up; why, Lord bress you, missis, we'll be all right agin in a few days. Work has been kinder pressin' lately, and chil'ns clothes an't quite so 'spectable; but, den, I's doin' heaps o' mendin.' See dat ar,' said he, holding up a slip of red flannel, resplendent with a black patch, 'dat ar hole won't go no furdur—and it does well enough for Teddy to wear, rollin' round de do', and such like times to save his bettermost. And de way I's put de yarn in dese yer stockings, an't slow. Den I's laid out to take a stitch in Teddy's shoes; and dat ar hole in de kiverlet, dat ar'll be stopped 'fore morning. O let me alone, he! he! he!—ye didn't keep Tiff for nothing, missis—ho! ho! ho!' and the black face seemed really to become unctuous with the oil of gladness, as Tiff proceeded in his work of consolation.

'O, Tiff, Tiff, you're a good creature! but you don't know. Here I've been lying alone, day after day, and he off nobody knows where; and when he comes, it 'll be only a day, and he's off; and all he does don't amount to anything—all miserable rubbish brought home and traded off for other rubbish. O, what a fool I was for being married! O, dear! Girls little know what marriage is! I thought it was so dreadful to be an old maid, and a pretty thing to get married! But, O, the pain, and worry, and sickness, I've gone through! Always wandering from place to place, never settled; one thing going after another, worrying, watching, weary—and all for nothing, for I am worn out, and I shall die!'

'O Lord no!' said Tiff, earnestly. 'Lor, Tiff 'll make ye some tea, and give it to ye, ye poor lamb! It's drefful hard, so 'tis; but times 'll mend, and massa 'll come round and be more settled like, and Teddy will grow up and help his ma; and I'm sure dere isn't a peartier young un dan dis yer puppet,' said he, turning fondly to the trough where the little fat, red mass of incipient humanity was beginning to throw up two small fists, and to utter sundry small squeaks, to intimate his desire to come into notice.

'Lor, now,' said he, adroitly depositing Teddy on the floor, and taking up the baby, whom he regarded fondly through his great spectacles; 'stretch away, my pretty! stretch away! ho eho! Dar, if he hasn't got his mammy's eye, for all dis worl! Ah, brave! See him, missis,' said he, laying the little bundle on the bed by her. 'Did you ever see a peartier young un? He! he! he! Dar, now, his mammy should take him, so she should! and Tiff 'll make mammy some tea, so he will!' And Tiff in a moment was on his knees, carefully laying together the ends of the burned sticks, and blowing a cloud of white ashes, which powdered his woolly head and red shawl like snow-flakes, while Teddy was busy in pulling the needles out of some knitting-work which hung in a bag by the fire. Tiff, having started the fire by blowing, proceeded very carefully to adjust upon it a small black porringer of water, singing, as he did so,

‘My way is dark and cloudy.
So it is, so it is;
My way is dark and cloudy,
All de day.’

Then, rising from his work, he saw that the poor, weak mother had clasped the baby to her bosom, and was sobbing very quietly.

Tiff, as he stood there with his short, square, ungainly figure, his long arms hanging out from his side like bows, his back covered by the red shawl, looked much like a compassionate tortoise standing on its hind legs. He looked pitifully at the sight, took off his glasses and wiped his eyes, and lifted up his voice in another stave:—

‘But we’ll join de forty tousand by and by,
So we will, so we will.
We’ll join de forty tousand, upon de golden shore,
And our sorrows will be gone for evermore, more, more.’

‘Bress my soul, massa Teddy now has been haulin’ out de needles from Miss Fanny’s work. Dat ar an’t purty, now. Tiff’ll be ’shamed of ye, and ye do like dat when your ma’s sick! Don’t ye know ye must be good, else Tiff won’t tell ye no stories! Dar, now, sit down on dis yer log; dat ar’s just the nicest log! plenty o’ moss on it yer can be a pickin’ out! Now, yer sit still dar, and don’t be interruptin’ yer ma.’

The urchin opened a wide, round pair of blue eyes upon Tiff, looking as if he were mesmerized, and sat, with a quiet subdued air, upon his log, while Tiff went fumbling about in a box in the corner. After some rattling he produced a pine knot, as the daylight was fading fast in the room, and driving it into a crack in another log which stood by the chimney-corner, he proceeded busily to light it, muttering as he did so, ‘Want to make it more cheerful like.’ Then he knelt down and blew the coals under the little porringer, which, like pine coals in general, always sulked and looked black when somebody was not blowing them. He blew vigorously, regardless of the clouds of ashes which encircled him, and which settled even on the tips of his eyelashes, and balanced themselves on the end of his nose. ‘Bress de

Lord, I's dreadful strong in my breff! Lord dey might have used me in blacksmisshin! I's kep dis yer chimney a gwine dis many a day. I wonder, now, what keeps Miss Fanny out so long?' And Tiff rose up with the greatest precaution, and, glancing every moment towards the bed, and almost tipping himself over in his anxiety to walk softly, advanced to the rude door, which opened with a wooden latch and string, opened it carefully and looked out.

Looking out with him, we perceive that the little hut stands alone, in the heart of a dense pine forest, which shuts it in on every side. Tiff held the door open a few moments to listen. No sound was heard but the shivering wind, swaying and surging in melancholy cadences through the long pine-leaves—a lonesome, wailing, uncertain sound.

'Ah, dese yer pine-trees, dey always a talkin,' said Tiff to himself, in a sort of soliloquy. 'Whisper, whisper, whisper! Do Lord knows what it's all about; dey never tells folks what dey wants to know. Hark! dar is Foxy as sure as I'm a livin' sinner. Ah! dar she is!' as a quick loud bark reverberated. 'Ah, ha! Foxy, you'll bring her along!' caressing a wolfish-looking lean cur, who came bounding through the trees. 'Ah, yer good-for-nothing! what makes yer run so fast, and leave yer missus behind ye? Hark! what's dat?' The clear voice came carolling gaily from out the pine-trees,

'If you get there before I do—
I'm bound for the land of Canaan.'

Whereupon Tiff, kindling with enthusiasm, responded,

'Look out for me—I'm coming too—
I'm bound for de land of Canaan.'

The response was followed by a gay laugh, as a childish voice shouted from the woods, 'Ha, Tiff, you there?'

And immediately a bold, bright, blue-eyed girl, of about eight years old, came rushing forward.

'Hors, Miss Fanny, so grad you's come! yer ma's powerful weak dis yer artemnoon.' And then, sinking his voice to a whisper, 'Why, now, you'd better b'leve her sperits isn't the best. Why, she's that bad, Miss Fanny, she actually been a cryin when I put de baby in her arms. Raily I'm consarned, and I wish yer pa 'ud come home. Did yer bring der medicine?'

'Ah, yes; here 'tis.'

'Ah, so good! I was a makin' of her some tea, to set her up like, and I'll put a little drop of dis yer in't. You gwin now, and speak to yer ma, and I'll pick up a little light wood round here, and make up de fire. Massa Teddy 'll be powerful glad to see you. Hope you's got him something too.'

The girl glided softly into the room, and stood over the bed where her mother was lying.

'Mother, I've come home,' said she, gently.

The poor frail creature in the bed seemed to be in one of those helpless hours of life's voyage when all its waves and billows are breaking over the soul; and while the little newcomer was blindly rooting and striving at her breast, she had gathered the worn counterpane over her face, and the bed was shaken by her sobbings.

'Mother! mother! mother!' said the child, softly touching her.

'Go away! go away child! O, I wish I had never been born! I wish you had never been born, nor Teddy, nor the baby! It's all nothing but trouble and sorrow. Fanny, don't you ever marry. Mind what I tell you!'

The child stood frightened by the bedside, while Tiff had softly deposited a handful of pine-wood near the fireplace, had taken off the porringer, and was busily stirring and concocting something in an old cracked china mug. As he stirred, a strain of indignation seemed to cross his generally tranquil mind, for he often gave short sniffs and grunts, indicative of extreme disgust, and muttered to himself, 'Dis yer comes of quality marrying these yer poor white folks! Never had no 'pinion on it, no way! Ah! do hear the poor lamb now! 'nough to break one's heart.'

By this time, the stirring and flavouring being finished to his taste, he came to the side of the bed, and began, in a coaxing tone—'Come now, Miss Sue, come! You's all worn out. No wonder! dat ar great fellow tugging at you! bless his dear little soul he's gaining half a pound a week; 'nough to pull down his ma entirely. Come, now; take a little sup of this—just a little sup, warm you up, and put a bit of life in you; and den I 'spects to fry you a morsel of der chicken, 'cause a boy like dis yer can't be nursed on slops, dat I knows; dere, dere, honey,' said he, gently removing the babe, and passing his arm under the pillow. 'It's drestful stroug in the back. My arm is long and strong, and and I'll raise you up just as easy. Take a good sup on it, now, wash dese troubles down. I reckon the good Lord above is looking down on us all, and will bring us all round right, some time.'

The invalid, who seemed exhausted by the burst of feeling to which she had been giving way, mechanically obeyed a voice to which she had always been accustomed, and drank eagerly, as if with feverish thirst; and when she had done, she suddenly threw her arms around the neck of her strange attendant.

‘O, Tiff, Tiff! poor old black, faithful Tiff! What should I have done without you? So sick as I’ve been, and so weak, and so lonesome. But, Tiff, it’s coming to an end pretty soon. I’ve seen to-night that I’m not going to live long, and I’ve been crying to think the children have got to live. If I could only take them all into my arms, and all lie down in the grave together, I should be so glad! I never knew what God made me for! I’ve never been fit for anything, nor done anything!’

Tiff seemed so utterly overcome by this appeal, his great spectacles were fairly washed down in a flood of tears, and his broad, awkward frame shook with sobs.

‘Law bless you, Miss Sue, don’t be talking dat ar way! Why if de Lord should call you, Miss Sue, I can take care of de chil’en. I can bring them up powerful, I tell ye! But you won’t be a-going; you’ll get better! It’s just de sperits is low; and, laws why should’nt dey be?’

Just at this moment a loud barking was heard outside the house, together with the rattle of wheels and the tramp of horses’ feet.

‘Dar’s massa, sure as I’m alive!’ said he, hastily laying down the invalid and arranging her pillows.

A rough voice called, ‘Hallo Tiff, here with a light!’

Tiff caught the pine-knot, and ran to open the door. A strange-looking vehicle, of a most unexampled composite order, was standing before the door, drawn by a lean, one-eyed horse.

‘Missis is powerful bad; been wanting to see you dis long time.’

‘Well, away, Tiff! take this out,’ indicating a long, rusty piece of stove-pipe. ‘Lay this in the house; and here!’ handing a cast-iron stove-door, with the latch broken.

‘Law, massa, what on arth is de use of dis yer?’

‘Don’t ask questions, Tiff; work away. Help me out with these boxes.’

‘What on arth now?’ said Tiff to himself, as one rough case after another was disgorged from the vehicle, and landed in the small cabin. This being done, and orders being given to Tiff to look after the horse and equipage, the man walked into the house, with a jolly, slashing air.

'Hallo, bub!' said he, lifting the three-year old above his head. 'Hallo, Fan!' imprinting a kiss on the cheek of his girl, 'Hallo, Sis!' coming up to the bed where the invalid lay, and stooping down over her. Her weak wasted arms were thrown around his neck, and she said, with sudden animation,—

'O, you've come at last! I thought I should die without seeing you!'

'O, you an't a-going to die, Sis! why, what talk!' said he, chucking her under the chin. 'Why, your cheeks are as red as roses!'

'Pa, sec the baby!' said little Teddy, who, having climbed over the bed, opened the flannel bundle.

'Ah! Sis, I call that ar a tolerable fair stroke of business! Well, I tell you what, I've done up a trade now that will set us up and no mistake. Besides which I've got something now in my coat-pocket that would raise a dead cat to life if she was lying at the bottom of a pond, with a stone round her neck! See here! Dr. Puffer's Elixir of the Water of Life! warranted to cure jaundice, tooth-ache, scrofula, speptia, 'sumption, and everything else that ever I hearn of! A tea-spoonful of that ar, morn and night, and in a week you'll be round agin, as pert as a cricket!'

It was astonishing to see the change which the entrance of this man had wrought on the invalid. All her apprehensions seemed to have vanished. She sat up on the bed, following his every movement with her eyes, and apparently placing full confidence in the new medicine, as if it were the first time that ever a universal remedy had been proposed to her. It must be noticed, however, that Tiff who had returned, and was building the fire, indulged himself now and then, when the back of the speaker was turned, by snuffling at him in a particularly contemptuous manner. The man was a thickset and not ill-looking personage, who might have been forty or forty-five years of age. His eyes, of a clear, lively brown, his close curling hair, his high forehead, and a certain devil-may-care frankness of expression, were traits not disagreeable, and which went some way to account for the partial eagerness with which the eye of the wife followed him. The history of the pair is briefly told. He was the son of a small farmer of North Carolina. His father having been so unfortunate as to obtain possession of a few negroes, the whole family became ever after inspired with an intense disgust for all kinds of labour ; and John, the oldest son, adopted for himself the ancient and honourable profession of a loafer. To lie idle in the sun in front of some small grog-shop, to attend horse-races, cock-fights, and gander-pullings, to flaunt out occasionally in a new waistcoat, bought with money which came nobody knew how, were pleasures to him all-satisfactory. He was as guiltless of all knowledge of common school-learning as Governor Berkeley could desire, and far more clear of religious training than a Mahometan or a Hindoo. In one of his rambling excursions through the country, he stopped a night at a worn-out and broken-down old plantation, where everything had run down, through many years of mismanagement and waste. There he stayed certain days, playing cards with the equally-hopeful son of the place, and ended his performances by running away one night with the soft-hearted daughter, only fifteen years of age, and who was full as idle, careless, and untaught, as he.

The family, whom poverty could not teach to forget their pride, were greatly scandalized at the marriage ; and, had there been anything left in the worn-out estate wherewith to portion her, the bride, nevertheless, would have been portionless. The sole piece of property that went out with her from the paternal mansion was one who, having a mind and will of his own, could not be kept from following her. The girl's mother had come from a distant branch of one of the most celebrated families in Virginia, and Tiff had been her servant ; and with a heart for ever swelling with the remembrances of the ancestral greatness of the Peytons, he followed his young mistress in her mésalliance with long-suffering devotion. He even bowed his neck so far as to acknowledge for his master a man whom he considered, by position, infinitely his inferior ; for Tiff, though crooked and black, never seemed to cherish the slightest doubt that the whole force of the Peyton blood coursed through his veins, and that the Peyton honour was intrusted to his keeping. His mistress was a Peyton, her children were Peyton children, and, even the little bundle of flannel in the gum-tree cradle was a Peyton ; and as for him, he was Tiff Peyton ; and this thought warmed and consoled him as he followed his poor mistress, during all the steps of her downward course in the world. On her husband he looked with patronizing, civil contempt. He wished him well ; he thought it proper to put the best face on all his actions ; but, in a confidential hour, Tiff would sometimes raise his spectacles emphatically, and give it out, as his own private opinion, 'that dere could not be much 'spected from dat ar 'scription of people!' In fact the roving and unsettled nature of John Cripps' avocations and locations might have justified the old fellow's contempt. His industrial career might be defined as comprising a little of everything, and a great deal of nothing. He had begun, successively, to learn two or three trades; had half made a horse-shoe, and spoiled one or two carpenter's planes; had tried his hand at stage-driving; had raised fighting-cocks, and kept dogs for hunting negroes. But he invariably retreated from every one of his avocations, in his own opinion a much-abused man. The last device that had entered his head was suggested by the success of a shrewd Yankee pedlar, who, having a lot of damaged and unsaleable material to dispose of, talked him into the belief that he possessed yet an undeveloped talent for trade; and poor John Cripps, guiltless of multiplication or addition table, and who kept his cock-fighting accounts on his fingers and by making chalk-marks behind the doors, actually was made to believe that he had at last received his true vocation. In fact there was something in the constant restlessness of this mode of life, that suited his roving turn; and, though he was constantly buying what he could not sell, and losing on all that he did sell, yet somehow he kept up an illusion that he was doing something, because stray coins now and then passed through his pockets, and because the circle of small taverns in which he could drink and loaf was considerably large. There was one resource which never failed him when all other streams went dry; and that was the unceasing ingenuity and fidelity of the bondman Tiff. Tiff, in fact, appeared to be one of those comfortable old creatures who retain such a good understanding with all created nature, that food never is denied them. Fish would always bite on Tiff's hook when they wouldn't on anybody's else; so that he was wont confidently to call the nearest stream 'Tiff's pork-barrel.' Hens always laid eggs for Tiff, and cackled to him confidentially where they were deposited. Turkeys gobbled and strutted for him, and led forth for him flocks of downy little ones. All sorts of wild game, squirrels, rabbits, coons, and possums, appeared to come with pleasure and put themselves into his traps and springes; so that where another man might starve, Tiff would look round him with unctuous satisfaction, contemplating all nature as his larder, where his provisions were wearing fur coats, and walking about on four legs, plying for safe keeping till he got ready to eat them. So that Cripps never came home without anticipation of something savory, even although he had darnk up his last quarter of a dollar at the tavern. This suited Cripps. He thought Tiff was doing his duty, and occasionally brought him home some unsaleable bit of rubbish, by way of testimonial of the sense he entertained of his worth. The spectacles in which Tiff gloried came to him in this manner; and although it might have been made to appear that the glasses were only plain window-glass, Tiff was happily ignorant that they were not the best of convex lenses, and still happier in the fact that his strong unimpaired eyesight made any glasses at all entirely unnecessary. It was only an aristocratic weakness in Tiff. Spectacles he somehow considered the mark of a gentleman, and an appropriate symbol for one who had 'been fetched up in the very fustest families of old Virginny.' He deemed them more particularly appropriate, as, in addition to his manifold outward duties, he likewise assumed, as the reader has seen, some feminine accomplishments. Tiff could darn a stocking with anybody in the country; he could cut out children's dresses and aprons; he could patch, and he could seam; all which he did with infinite self-satisfaction.

Notwithstanding the many crooks and crosses in his lot, Tiff was, on the whole, a cheery fellow. He had an oily, rollicking fulness of nature, an exuberance of physical satisfaction in existence, that the greatest weight of adversity could only tone down to becoming sobriety. He was on the happiest terms of fellowship with himself; he liked himself, he believed in himself; and when nobody else would do it, he would pat himself on his own shoulder, and say, 'Tiff, you're a jolly dog, a fine fellow, and I like you.' He was seldom without a running strain of soliloquy with himself, intermingled with joyous bursts of song, and quiet intervals of laughter. On pleasant days Tiff laughed a great deal. He laughed when his beans came up, he laughed when the sun came ~~out~~ after a storm, he laughed for fifty things that you never think of laughing at; and it agreed with him, he threw upon it. In times of trouble and perplexity Tiff talked to himself, and found a counsellor who always kept secrets.

On the present occasion it was not without some inward discontent that he took a survey of the remains of one of his best-fatted chickens, which he had been intending to serve up, piecemeal, for his mistress. So he relieved his mind by a little colloquy with himself.

'Dis yer,' he said to himself, with a contemptuous inclination towards the newly-arrived, 'will be for eating like a judgment, I 'spose. Wish, now, I had killed de old gobbler. Good enough for him; rual tough he is. Dis yer, now, was my primest chicken, and dar she'll just sit and see him eat it. Laws, dese yer women! Why, dey does get so sot on husbands. Pity dey couldn't have something like to be sot on. It jist riles me to see him gobbling down everything, and she a-looking on. Well, here goes,' said he, depositing the frying-pan over the coals, in which the chicken was soon frizzling. Drawing out the table, Tiff prepared it for supper. Soon coffee was steaming over the fire, and corn-dodgers baking in the ashes. Meanwhile John Cripps was busy explaining to his wife the celebrated wares that had so much raised his spirits.

'Well, now, you see, Sue, this yer time I've been up to Raleigh, and I met a fellow there coming from New York or New Orleans, or some of them northern states.'

'New Orleans isn't a northern state,' humbly interposed his wife, 'is it?'

'Well, New something. Who the devil cares? Don't you be interrupting me, you Suse.' Could Cripps have seen the vengeful look Tiff gave him over his spectacles at this moment, he might have trembled for his supper. But, innocent of this, he proceeded with his story. 'You see, this yer fellow had a case of bonnets just the height of the fashion. They come from Paris, the capital of Europe; and he sold them to me for a mere song. Ah, you ought to see 'em. I'm going to get 'em out. Tiff, hold the candle here.' And Tiff held the burning torch with an air of grim scepticism and disgust, while Cripps hammered and wrenched the top boards off, and displayed to view a portentous array of bonnets, apparently of every obsolete style and fashion of the last fifty years.

'Dem's fast-rate for scare-crows, anyhow!' muttered Tiff.

'Now, what,' said Cripps,—'Sue, what do you think I gave for these?'

'I don't know,' said she, faintly.

'Well, I gave fifteen dollars for the whole box. And there ain't one of these,' said he, displaying the most singular specimen on his hand, 'that isn't worth from two to five dollars. I shall clear, at least, fifty dollars on that box.'

Tiff, at this moment, turned to his frying-pan and bent over it, oliloquising as he did so, 'Any way, I's found out one ting—where de women gets dem roosts of bonnets dey wears at camp-meetings. Laws, dey's enough to spile a work of grace, dem ar ! If I was to meet one of dem ar of a dark night in a graveyard, I should tink I was sent for—not the pleasantest way of sending, neither. Poor missis!—looking mighty faint. Don't wonder. 'Nough to scare a weakly woman into fits.'

'Here, Tiff, help me to open this box. Hold the light here. Durned if it don't come off hard. Here's a lot of shoes and boots I got of the same man. Some on 'em's mates, and some ain't; but then I took the lot cheap. Folks don't always ware both shoes alike. Might like to ware an odd one, sometimes, if it's cheap. Now, this yer pair of boots is lady's gaiters all complete, 'cept there's a hole in the lining down by the toe; body ought to be careful about putting it on, else the foot will slip between the outside and the lining. Anybody that bears that in mind just as nice a pair of gaiters as they'd want. Bargain there for somebody—complete one, too. Then, I've got two or three old bureau-drawers that I got cheap at auctions; and I reckon some on 'em will fit the old frame that I got last year. Got 'em for a mere song.'

'Bress you, massa, dat ar old bureau I took for the chicken coop. Turkey's chickens hops in lively.'

'Oh, well, scrub it up; 'twill answer just as well. Fit the drawers in. And now, old woman, we will sit down to supper,' said he, planting himself at the table, and beginning a vigorous onslaught on the fried chicken, without invitation to any other person present to assist him.

'Missis can't sit up at the table,' said Tiff. 'She's done been sick ever since de baby was born.' And Tiff approached the bed with a nice morsel of chicken which he had providently preserved on a plate, and which he now reverently presented on a board as a waiter, covered with a newspaper. 'Now, do eat, missis; you can't live on looking, noways you can fix it. Do eat while Tiff gets on de baby's night-gown.'

To please her old friend, the woman made a feint of eating, but, while Tiff's back was turned to the fire, busied herself with distributing it to the children, who had stood hungrily regarding her as children will regard what is put on to a sick mother's plate.

'It does me good to see them eat,' she said, apologetically, once when Tiff, turning round, detected her in the act.

'Ah, missis, may be, but you've got to eat for two now. What dey eat ain't going to dis yer little man here. Mind dat ar.'

Cripps apparently bestowed very small attention on anything except the important business before him, which he prosecuted with such devotion that very soon coffee, chickens, and dodgers all disappeared. Even the bones were sucked dry, and the gravy wiped from the dish.

'Ah, that's what I call comfortable,' said he, lying back in his chair. 'Tiff, pull my boots off, and hand out that ar demijohn. Sue, I hope you've made a comfortable meal,' he said, incidentally standing with his back to her, compounding the potation of whiskey-and-water, which, having drauk, he called up Teddy, and offered him the sugar at the bottom of the glass. But Teddy, being forewarned by a meaning glance through Tiff's spectacles, responded very politely,—

'No, thank you, pa, I don't love it.'

'Come here, then, and take it off like a man. It's good for you,' said John Cripps.

The mother's eyes followed the child wistfully; and she said, faintly, 'Don't, John—don't!' And Tiff ended the controversy by taking the glass unceremoniously out of his master's hand.

'Laws bress you, massa, can't be bodered with dese yer young ones dis yer time of night. Time dey's all in bed, and dishes washed up. Here, Tedd,' seizing the child, and loosening the buttons of his slip behind, and drawing out a rough trundle-bed, 'you crawl in dere, and curl up in your nest; and don't you forget your prars, honey, else, maybe, you'll never wake up again.'

Cripps had now filled a pipe with tobacco of the most villanous character, and with which incense he was perfuming the little apartment.

'Laws, massa, dat ar smoke an't good for missis,' said Tiff. 'She done been sick to her stomach all day.'

'Oh, let him smoke. I like to have him enjoy himself,' said the indulgent wife. 'But, Fanny, you had better go to-bed, dear. Come here and kiss me chuld; good-night—good-night!'

The mother held on to her long, and looked at her wistfully; and when she had turned to go, she drew her back, and kissed her again, and said, 'Good night, dear child, good night!'

Fanny climbed up a ladder in one corner of the room through a square hole to the loft above.

'I say,' said Cripps, taking his pipe out of his mouth, and looking at Tiff, who was washing the dishes—'I say, it's kind of peculiar that gal keeps sick so. Seemed to have good constitution when I married her. I'm thinking,' said he, without noticing the gathering wrath in Tiff's face—'I'm a-thinking whether steamin' wouldn't do her good. Now, I got a most dreadful cold when I was up at Raleigh; thought I should have given up; and there was a steam doctor there. Had a little kind of machine, with kettle and pipes, and he put me in bed, put in the pipes, and set it a-going. I thought, my soul, I should have been floated off; but it carried off the cold complete; I'm thinking if something of that kind wouldn't be good for Miss Cripps.'

'Laws, massa, don't go for to trying it on her! She is never no better for dese yer things you do for her.'

'Now,' said Cripps, not appearing to notice the interruption, 'these yer stove-pipes and the tea-kettle,—I shouldn't wonder if we could get up a steam with them.'

'It's my private 'pinion if you do, she'll be sailing out of the world,' said Tiff. 'What's one man's meat is another man's pisin, my old missis used to say. Very best thing you can do for her is to leave her alone; dat ar is my 'pinion.'

'John,' said the little woman, after a few minutes, 'I wish you'd come here and sit on the bed.' There was something positive and almost authoritative in the manner in which this was said which struck John as so unusual, that he came with a bewildered air, sat down, and gazed at her with his mouth wide open. 'I'm so glad you've come, because I have had things that I've wanted to say to you. I've been lying here thinking about it, and I've been turning it over in my mind. I'm going to die soon, I know.'

'Ah! bah! don't be bothering a fellow with any of your hysterics.'

'John, John, it isn't hysterics. Look at me! Look at my hand—look at my face. I'm so weak, and sometimes I have such coughing spells, and every time it seems to me as if I should die. But it ain't to trouble you that I talk. I don't care about myself, but I don't want the children to grow up and be like we've been. You have a great many contrivances; do pray contrive to have them taught to read, and make something of them in the world.'

'Bah! what's the use? I never learnt to read, and I'm as good a fellow as I want. Why, there's plenty of men round here making their money every year that can't read or write a word. Old Hubell, there, up on the Shad plantation, has hauled in money and over hand, and he always signs his mark. Got nine sons—can't a soul of them read or write more than I. I tell you there's nothing ever comes of this yer learning. It's all a sell—a regular Yankee hoax. I've always got cheated by them damn reading, writing Yankees whenever I've traded with 'em. What's the good, I want to know? You was teach'd how to read when you was young; much good it's ever done you!

'Sure enough. Sick day and night; moving about from place to place; sick baby crying, and not knowing what to do for it no more than a child. Oh, I hope Fanny will learn something! It seems to me if there was some school for my children to go to, or some church, or something—now, if there is any such place as heaven, I should like to have them get to it.'

'Ah! bah! don't bother about that. When we get keeled up, that will be the last of us. Come, come, don't plague a fellow any more with such talk. I'm tired, and I'm going to sleep.' And the man, divesting himself of his overcoat, threw himself on the bed, and was soon snoring heavily in profound slumber.

Tiff, who had been trotting the baby by the fire, now came softly to the bedside and sat down. 'Miss 'Sue,' he said, 'it's no 'count talking to him. I don't mean nothing dis'spectful, Miss Sue, but de fac is, dem dat isn't born gentlemen can't be 'spected fur to see through dese yer things like us of de old families. Law, missis, don't you worry! Now, jest leave this yer matter to old Tiff. Dere never wasn't anything Tiff couldn't do, if he tried. He! he! he! Miss Fanny, she done got de letters right smart; and I know I'll come it round massa, and make him buy de books for her. I'll tell you what's come into my head to-day. There's a young lady come to de big plantation, up dere, who's been to New York getting edicated, and I's going for to ask her about dese yer things, and, about de chil'en's going to church, and dese yer things. Why, preaching, you know, is mazin' unsartain round here; but I'll keep on de look out, and do de best I can. Why, Lord, Miss Sue, I's bound for the land of Canaan myself, the best way I can; and I'm sartain I shan't go without taking the chil'en along with me. Ho! ho! ho! Dat's what I shan't; de chil'en will have to be with Tiff, and Tiff will have to be with the chil'en, wherever dey is. Dat's it. He! he! he!

'Tiff,' said the young woman, her large blue eyes looking at him, 'I have heard of the Bible; have you ever seen one, Tiff?'

'O, yes, honey, dar was a big Bible that your ma brought in the family when she married; but dat ar was tore up to make wadding for de guns, one thing or another, and dey never got no more. But I's been very 'serving, and kept my ears open in a camp meeting and such places, and I's learnt right smart of de things that's in it.'

'Now, Tiff, can you say anything?' said she, fixing her large troubled eyes on him.

'Well, honey, dere's one thing the man said at de last camp meeting. He preached 'bout it, and I couldn't make out a word he said, 'cause I an't smart about preaching like I be about most things; but he said dis yer so often that I couldn't help 'member it. Says he, it was dish yer way, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."'

'Rest, rest, rest!' said the woman, thoughtfully, and drawing a long sigh. 'O, how much I want it. Did he say that was in the Bible?'

'Yes, he said so; and I 'spects, by all he said, it's de good Lord above dat says it. It always make me feel better to think on it. It 'peared like it was just what I was wanting to hear.'

'And I too,' she said, turning her head wearily, and closing her eyes. 'Tiff,' she said, opening them, 'where I'm going may be I shall meet the one who said that, and I'll ask him about it. Don't talk to me more now, I'm getting sleepy. I thought I was better a little while after he came home, but I'm more tired yet. Put the baby in my arms, I like the feeling of it. There, there, now give me rest, please do.' And she sank into a deep and quiet slumber.

Tiff softly covered the fire, and sat down by the bed, watching the flickering shadows as they danced upward on the wall, listening to the heavy sighs of the pine-trees, and the hard breathing of the sleeping man. Sometimes he nodded sleepily, and then, recovering, rose and took a turn to awaken himself. A shadowy sense of fear fell upon him, not that he apprehended anything, for he regarded the words of his mistress only as the forebodings of a wearied invalid. The idea that she could actually die, and go anywhere, without him to take care of her, seemed never to have occurred to him. About midnight, as if a spirit had laid his hand upon him, his eyes flew wide open with a sudden start. Her thin cold hand was lying on his, her eyes, large and blue, shone with a singular and spiritual radiance.

'Tiff,' she gasped, speaking with difficulty, 'I've seen the one that said that, and it's all true, too! and I've seen all why I've suffered so much. He—He—He is going to take me. Tell the children about Him.' There was a fluttering sigh, a slight shiver, and the lids fell over the eyes for ever.

CHAPTER IX.

THE DEATH.

DEATH is always sudden. However gradual may be its approaches, it is, in its effects upon the survivor, always sudden at last. Tiff thought at first that his mistress was in a fainting fit, and tried every means to restore her. It was affecting to see him chafing the thin, white, pearly hands in his large rough black paws; raising the head upon his arm, and calling in a thousand tones of fond endearment, pouring out a perfect torrent of loving devotion on the cold, unheeding ear. But then, spite of all he could do, the face settled itself, and the hands would not be warmed. The thought of death struck him suddenly, and throwing himself on the floor by the bed, he wept with an exceedingly loud and bitter cry. Something in his heart revolted against awakening that man who lay heavily breathing by her side. He would not admit to himself at this moment that this man had any right in her, or that the sorrow was any part of his sorrow. But the cry awoke Cripps, who sat up bewildered in the bed, clearing the hair from his eyes with the back of his hand.

‘Tiff, what the durned are you howling about?’

Tiff got up in a moment, and swallowing down his grief and his tears, pointed indignantly to the still figure on the bed.

‘Dar! dar! wouldn’t b’lieve her last night; now what you think of that ar? See how you look now! Good Shepherd hearn you abusing de poor lamb, and he’s done took her whar you’ll never see her again.’

Cripps had, like coarse animal men generally, a stupid and senseless horror of death; he recoiled from the lifeless form, and sprang from the bed with an expression of horror.

‘Well, now, who’d have thought it?’ he said. ‘That I should be in bed with a corpse, I hadn’t the least idea.’

‘No, dat’s plain enough, you didn’t. You’ll believe it now, won’t you? Poor little lamb, lying here suffering all alone. I tell you when folks have been sick so long, dey has to die to make folks believe anything ails ’em.’

‘Well, really,’ said Cripps, ‘this is really—why, it an’t comfortable, darned if it is! Why, I’m sorry about the gal. meant to steam her up, or done something with her. What to do now?’

'Pretty likely you don't know. Folks like you dat never tends to nothing good, is always flustered when de Master knocks at de do'. I knows what to do though. I's boun' to get up de critter, and go up to de old plantation, and bring down a woman and do something for her, kind of decent. You mind the chil'en till I come back.'

Tiff took down and drew on over his outer garment a coarse light, woollen coat, with very long skirts and large buttons, in which he always arrayed himself in cases of special solemnity. Stopping at the door before he went out, he looked over Cripps from head to foot, with an air of patronizing and half-pitiful contempt, and delivered himself as follows: 'Now, massa, I's gwine up, and will be back quick as possible. And do pray be decent, and let dat ar whiskey alone for one day in your life, and 'member death, judgment, and 'ternity. Just act, now, as if you'd got a streak of something in you, such as a man ought for to have who is married to one of the very fustest families in Old Virginny. 'Flect, now, on your latter end; may be will do your poor old soul some good. And don't you go for to waking up de chil'en before I gets back; dey'll learn the trouble soon enough.'

Cripps listened to this oration with a stupid, bewildered stare, gazing first at the bed, then at the old man, who was soon making all the speed he could towards Canema.

Nina was not habitually an early riser, but on this morning she had awaked with the first peep of dawn, and finding herself unable to go to sleep again, she had dressed herself and gone down to the garden. She was walking up and down in one of the alleys, thinking over the perplexities of her own affairs, when her ear was caught by the wild and singular notes of one of those tunes commonly used among the slaves as dirges. The words,

'She ar dead and gone to heaven,' seemed to come floating down upon her; and though the voice was cracked and strained, there was a sort of wildness and pathos in it which made a singular impression in the perfect stillness of everything around her. She soon observed a singular-looking vehicle appearing in the avenue. The waggon, which was no other than the establishment of Cripps, drew Nina's attention, and she went to the hedge to look at it. Tiff's watchful eye immediately fell upon her, and, driving up to where she was standing, he climbed out upon the ground, and, lifting his hat, made her a profound obeisance, and 'hoped de young lady was bery well, dis morning.'

'Yes, quite well, thank you, uncle,' said Nina, regarding him curiously.

'We's in 'fliction to our house,' said Tiff, solemnly. 'Dere's been a midnight cry dere, and poor Miss Sue (dat's my young missis), she's done gone home.'

'Who is your mistress?'

'Well, her name was Seymour 'fore she married, and her ma come from de Virginny Peytons. Great family dem Peytons! She was so misfortunate as to get married, as gals will sometimes,' said Tiff, speaking in a confidential tone. 'The man wan't no 'count, and she's had a drestful hard way to travel, poor thing! And dere she's a lying at last, stretched out dead, and not a woman nor nobody to do de least thing. And please, missis, Tiff comed for to see if de young lady wouldn't send a woman for to do for her, getting her ready for a funeral.'

'And who are you, pray?'

'Please, missis, I's Tiff Peyton, I is. I's raised in Virginny, on de great Peyton place, and I's gin to Miss Sue's mother; and when Miss Sue married dis yer man, dey was all 'fended, and wouldn't speak to her; but I tuck up for her, 'cause what's de use of makin' a bad thing worse? I's a 'pinion, and telled 'em, dat he oughter be 'couraged to behave hisself, seein' de thing was done, and couldn't be helped. But no, dey wouldn't; so I jist tells 'em, says I, "you may do jis you please, but old Tiff's a gwine with her," says I; "I'll follow Miss Sue to the grave's mouth," says I, and ye see I has done it.'

'Well done of you; I like you better for it,' said Nina. 'You just drive up to the kitchen, there, and tell Rose to give you some breakfast, while I go up to aunt Nesbit.'

'No, thank you, Miss Nina, I's noways hungry. 'Pears like, when a body's like as I be, swallerin' down, and all de old times risin' in der throat all de time, dey can't eat; dey gets filled all up to der eyes with feelin's. Lord, Miss Nina, I hope ye won't never know what 'tis to stand outside de gate, when de best friend you've got's gone in; its hard, dat ar is!' And Tiff pulled out a decayed-looking handkerchief, and applied it under his spectacles.

'Well, wait a minute, Tiff.' And Nina ran into the house, while Tiff gazed mournfully after her.

'Well, Lor; just de way Miss Sue used to run—trip, trip trip!—little feet like mice! Lord's will be done!'

“O Milly!” said Nina, meeting Milly in the entry, “here you are. Here’s a poor fellow waiting out by the hedge, his mistress dead all alone in the house, with children—No women to do for them. Can’t you go down? You could do so well! You know how better than any body else in the house.”

“Why, dat must be poor old Tiff!” said Milly; “faithful old creature! So dat poor woman’s gone, at last; de better for her, poor soul! Well, I’ll ask Miss Loo if I may go—or you ask her, Miss Nina.”

A quick, imperative tap at the door startled aunt Nesbit, who was standing at her toilet, finishing her morning’s dressing-operations. Mrs. Nesbit was a particularly systematic early riser. Nobody knew why; only folks who have nothing to do are often the most particular to have the longest possible time to do it in.

“Aunt,” said Nina, “there’s a poor fellow, out here, whose mistress is just dead, all alone in the house, and wants to get some woman to go there to help. Can’t you spare Milly?”

“Milly was going to clear-starch my caps, this morning,” said aunt Nesbit: “I have arranged everything with reference to it for a week past.”

“Well, aunt, can’t she do it to-morrow, or next day, just as well?”

“To-morrow she is going to rip up that black dress, and wash it. I am always systematic, and have everything arranged beforehand. Should like very much to do anything I could, if it wasn’t for that. Why can’t you send aunt Katy?”

“Why, aunt, you know we are to have company to dinner, and aunt Katy is the only one who knows where anything is, or how to serve things out to the cook. Besides, she’s so hard and cross to poor people, I don’t think she would go. I don’t see, I’m sure, in such a case as this, why you can’t put your starching off. Milly is such a kind, motherly, experienced person; and they are in affliction.”

“O, these low families don’t mind such things much,” said aunt Nesbit, fitting on her cap, quietly; “they never have much feeling. There’s no use doing for them—they are iniserable poor creatures.”

“Aunt Nesbit, do, as a favour to me; I don’t often ask favours,” said Nina. “Do let Milly go: she’s just the one wanted. Do, now, say yes!” And Nina pressed nearer, and actually seemed to overpower her slow-feeling, torpid relative, with the vehemence that sparkled in her eye.

‘Well, I don’t care if—’

‘There, Milly, she says yes!’ said she, springing out the door. ‘She says you may. Now, hurry; get things ready. I’ll run and have aunt Katy put up biscuits and things for the children; and you get all that you know you will want, and be off quick; and I’ll have the pony got up, and come on behind you.’

CHAPTER X.

THE PREPARATION.

THE excitement produced by the arrival of Tiff, and the fitting out of Milly to the cottage, had produced a most favourable diversion in Nina’s mind from her own especial perplexities. Active and buoyant, she threw herself at once into whatever happened to come uppermost on the tide of events. So, having seen the waggon despatched, she sat down to breakfast in high spirits.

‘Aunt Nesbit, I declare I was so interested in that old man! I intend to have the pony, after breakfast, and ride over there.’

‘I thought you were expecting company.’

‘Well, that’s one reason, now, why I’d like to be off. Do I want to sit all primmed up, smirking and smiling, and running to the window to see if my gracious lord is coming? No, I won’t do that, to please any of them. If I happen to fancy to be out riding, I will be out riding.’

‘I think,’ said aunt Nesbit, ‘that the hovels of these miserable creatures are no proper place for a young lady of your position in life.’

‘My position in life! I don’t see what that has to do with it. My position in life enables me to do anything I please—a liberty which I take pretty generally. And then, really, I couldn’t help feeling rather sadly about it, because that old Tiff there (I believe that’s his name), told me that the woman had been of a good Virginian family. Very likely she may have been just such another wild girl as I am, and thought as little about bad times and of dying as I do. So I couldn’t help feeling sad for her. It really came over me, when I was walking in the garden. Such a beautiful morning as it was—the birds all singing, and the dew all glittering and shining on the flowers. Why, aunt, the flowers really seemed alive; it seemed as though I could hear them breathing, and hear their hearts beating like mine. And all of a sudden, I heard the most wild, mournful singing, over in the woods. It wasn't anything very beautiful, you know, but it was so wild and strange:—

‘She is dead and gone to heaven,
She is dead and gone to heaven!’

And pretty soon I saw the funniest old waggon—I don't know what to call it—and this queer old black man in it, with an old white hat, and surtout on, and a pair of great funny-looking spectacles on his nose. I went to the fence to see who he was; and he came up and spoke to me, made the most respectful bow—you ought to have seen it! And then, poor fellow, he told me how his mistress was lying dead, with the children around her, and nobody in the house! The poor old creature, he actually cried, and I felt so for him! He seemed to be proud of his dead mistress, in spite of her poverty.’

‘Where do they live?’ said Mrs. Nesbit.

‘Why, he told me, over in the pine-woods, near the swamp.’

‘O,’ said Mrs. Nesbit, ‘I dare say it's that Cripps' family, that's squatted in the pine-woods. A most miserable set—all of them liars and thieves! If I had known who it was I'm sure I shouldn't have let Milly go over. Such families oughtn't to be encouraged; there oughtn't a thing to be done for them; we shouldn't encourage them to stay in the neighbourhood. They always will steal from off the plantations, and corrupt the negroes; and get drunk, and everything else that's bad. There's never a woman of decent character among them that ever I heard of; and if you were my daughter, I shouldn't let you go near them.’

‘Well, I'm not your daughter, thank Fortune,’ said Nina, whose graces always rapidly declined in controversies with her aunt, ‘and so I shall do as I please. And I don't know what you pious people talk so for; for Christ went with publicans and sinners, I'm sure.’

‘Well,’ said aunt Nesbit, ‘the Bible says we mustn't cast pearls before swine; and when you've lived to be as old as I am, you'll know more than you do now. Everybody knows that you can't do anything with these people. You can't give them Bibles, nor tracts; for they can't read. I've tried it, sometimes, visiting them, and talking to them; but it didn't do them any good. I always thought there ought to be a law passed to make 'em all slaves, and then there would be somebody to take care of them.’

‘Well, I can't see,’ said Nina, ‘how it's their fault. There isn't any school where they could send their children, if they wanted to learn; and then if they want to work, there's nobody who wants to hire them. So, what can they do?"

'I'm sure I don't know,' said aunt Nesbit, in that tone which generally means I don't care. 'All I know is, that I want them to get away from the neighbourhood. Giving to them is just like putting into a bag with holes. I'm sure I put myself to a great inconvenience on their account to-day; for if there's anything I do hate, it is having things irregular. And to-day is the day for clear-starching the caps—and such a good, bright, sunny day!—and to-morrow, or any other day of the week, it may rain. Always puts me all out to have things that I've laid out to do put out of their regular order. I'd been willing enough to have sent over some old things; but why they must needs take Milly's time, just as if the funeral couldn't have got ready without her. These funerals are always miserable drunken times with them. And then, who knows, she may catch the small-pox, or something or other! There's never any knowing what these people die of.'

'They die of just such things as we do,' said Nina. 'They have that in common with us, at any rate.'

'Yes; but there's no reason for risking our lives, as I know of, especially for such people, when it don't do any good.'

'Why, aunt, what do you know against these folks? Have you ever known of their doing anything wicked?'

'O, I don't know that I know anything against this family in particular, but I know the whole race. These squatters, I've known them ever since I was a girl in Virginia. Everybody that knows anything knows exactly what they are. There isn't any help for them, unless, as I said before, they were made slaves; and then they could be kept decent. You may go to see them, if you like, but I don't want my arrangements to be interfered with on their account.'

Mrs. Nesbit was one of those quietly-persisting people, whose yielding is like the stretching of an India-rubber band, giving way only to a violent pull, and going back to the same place when the force is withdrawn. She seldom refused favours that were urged with any degree of importunity; not because her heart was touched, but simply because she seemed not to have force enough to refuse; and whatever she granted was always followed by a series of subdued lamentations over the necessity which and wrung them from her. Nina's nature was so vehement had imperious, when excited, that it was a disagreeable fatigue to cross her. Mrs. Nesbit, therefore, made amends by bemoaning herself as we have seen. Nina started up hastily, on seeing her pony brought round to the door; and soon arrayed in her riding-dress, she was cantering through the pine-woods in high spirits. The day was clear and beautiful. The floor of the woodland path was paved with a thick and cleanly carpet of the fallen pine leaves. And Harry was in attendance with her, mounted on another horse, and riding but a very little behind; not so much so but what his mistress could, if she would, keep up a conversation with him.

‘You know this old Tiff, Harry?’

‘O, yes, very well. A very good, excellent creature, and very much the superior of his master, in most respects.’

‘Well, he says his mistress came of a good family.’

‘I shouldn’t wonder,’ said Harry. ‘She always had a delicate appearance, very different from people in their circumstances generally. The children, too, are remarkably pretty, well-behaved children; and it’s a pity they couldn’t be taught something, and not grow up and go on these miserable ways of these poor whites!’

‘Why, don’t anybody ever teach them?’ said Nina.

‘Well, Miss Nina, you know how it is: everybody has his own work and business to attend to; there are no schools for them to go to; there’s no work for them to do. In fact there don’t seem to be any place for them in society. Boys generally grow up to drink and swear; and, as for girls, they are not of much account. So it goes on from generation to generation.’

‘This is so strange, and so different from what it is in the Northern states. Why, all the children go to school there; the very poorest people’s children! Why, a great many of the first men there were poor children! Why can’t there be some such thing here?’

‘O, because people are settled in such a scattering way, they can’t have schools. All the land that’s good for anything is taken up for large estates. And, then, these poor folks that are scattered up and down in between, it’s nobody’s business to attend to them, and they can’t attend to themselves; and so they grow up, and nobody knows how they live, and everybody seems to think it a pity they are in the world. I’ve seen those sometimes that would be glad to do something, if they could find anything to do. Planters don’t want them on their places; they’d rather have their own servants. If one of them wants to be a blacksmith, or a carpenter, there's no encouragement. Most of the large estates have their own carpenters and blacksmiths; and there's nothing for them to do, unless it is keeping dogs to hunt negroes; or those little low stores where they sell whiskey, and take what's stolen from the plantations. Sometimes a smart one gets a place as overseer on a plantation. Why, I've heard of their coming so low as actually to sell their children to traders, to get a bit of bread.'

'What miserable creatures! But do you suppose it can be possible that a woman of any respectable family can have married a man of this sort?'

'Well, I don't know, Miss Nina, that might be. You see, good families sometimes degenerate; and when they get too poor to send their children off to school, or keep any teachers for them, they run down very fast. This man is not bad-looking, and he really is a person who, if he had had any way opened to him, might have been a smart man, and made something of himself and family; and when he was young and better-looking, I shouldn't wonder if an uneducated girl, who had never been off a plantation, might have liked him; he was fully equal, I dare say, to her brothers. You see, Miss Nina, when money goes, in this part of the country, everything goes with it; and when a family is not rich enough to have everything in itself, it goes down very soon.'

'At any rate, I pity the poor things,' said Nina; 'I don't despise them, as aunt Nesbit does.'

Here Nina, observing the path clear and uninterrupted for some distance under the arching pines, struck her horse into a canter, and they rode on for some distance without speaking. Soon the horse's feet splashed and pattered on the cool, pebbly bottom of a small shallow stream, which flowed through the woods. This stream went meandering among the pines like a spangled ribbon, sometimes tying itself into loops, leaving open spots, almost islands, of green, graced by its waters. Such a little spot now opened to the view of the two travellers. It was something less than a quarter of an acre in extent, entirely surrounded by the stream, save only a small neck of about four feet, which connected it to the main land. Here a place had been cleared and laid off into a garden, which, it was evident, was carefully tended. The log-cabin that stood in the middle was far from having the appearance of wretchedness which Nina had expected. It was almost entirely a dense mass of foliage, being covered with the intermingled drapery of the Virginia creeper and the yellow jessamine. Two little borders, each side of the house, were blooming with flowers. Around the little island, the pine-trees closed in unbroken semicircles, and the brook meandered away through them, to lose itself eventually in that vast forest of swampy land which girdles the whole Carolina shore. The whole air of the place was so unexpectedly inviting in its sylvan stillness and beauty, that Nina could not help checking her horse, and exclaiming, 'I'm sure it's a pretty place! They can't be such very forsaken people, after all!'

'O, that's all Tiff's work,' said Harry; 'he takes care of everything outside and in, while the man is off after nobody knows what. You'd be perfectly astonished to see how that old creature manages. He sews, and he knits, and works the garden, does the housework, and teaches the children. It's a fact! You'll notice that they haven't the pronunciation or the manners of these wild white children; and I take it to be, all Tiff's watchfulness, for that creature hasn't one particle of selfishness in him. He just identifies himself with his mistress and her children.'

By this time Tiff had perceived their approach, and came out to assist them in dismounting.

'De Lord above bress you, Miss Gordon, for coming to see my poor missis! Ah! she is lying dere, just as beautiful, just as she was de very day she was married. All her young looks come back to her; and Milly, she done laid her out beautiful! Lord, I's wanting somebody to come and look at her, because she has got good blood, if she be poor. She is none of your common sort of poor whites, Miss Nina. Just come in; come in, and look at her!'

Nina stepped into the open door of the hut. The bed was covered with a clean white sheet, and the body, arranged in a long white night-dress brought by Milly, lay there so very still, quiet, and life-like, that one could scarcely realise the presence of death. The expression of exhaustion, fatigue, and anxiety, which the face had latterly worn, had given place to one of tender rest, shaded by a sort of mysterious awe, as if the closed eyes were looking on unutterable things. The soul, though sunk below the horizon of existence, had thrown back a twilight upon the face, radiant as that of the evening heavens. By the head of the bed the little girl was sitting, dressed carefully, and her curling hair parted in front, apparently fresh from the brush; and the little boy was sitting beside her, his round blue eyes bearing an expression of subdued wonder.

Cripps was sitting at the foot of the bed, evidently much the worse for liquor; for, spite of the exhortation of Tiff, he had applied to the whiskey-jug immediately on his departure. Why not? He was uncomfortable, gloomy; and every one, under such circumstances, naturally inclines towards some source of consolation. He who is intellectual reads and studies; he who is industrious flies to business; he who is affectionate seeks friends; he who is pious, religion; but he who is none of these—what has he but his whiskey? Cripps made a stupid, staring inclination towards Nina and Harry, as they entered, and sat still, twirling his thumbs and muttering to himself. The sunshine fell through the panes on the floor, and there came floating in from without the odour of flowers and the song of birds. All the Father's gentle messengers spoke of comfort; but he as a deaf man heard not—as a blind man did not regard. For the rest, an air of neatness had been imparted to the extreme poverty of the room, by the joint efforts of Milly and Tiff. Tiff entered softly, and stood by Nina, as she gazed. He had in his hand several sprays of white jessamine, and he laid one on the bosom of the dead.

'She had a hard walk of it,' he said, 'but she's got home! Don't she look peaceful? poor lamb!'

The little, thoughtless, gay coquette had never looked on a sight like this before. She stood with a fixed, tender, thoughtfulness, unlike her usual gaiety, her riding-hat hanging carelessly by its strings from her hands, her loose hair drooping over her face. She heard some one entering the cottage, but she did not look up. She was conscious of some one looking over her shoulder, and thought it was Harry.

'Poor thing! how young she looks,' she said, 'to have had so much trouble!' Her voice trembled, and a tear stood in her eye. There was a sudden movement; she looked up, and Clayton was standing by her. She looked surprised, and the colour deepened in her cheek, but was too ingenuously and really in sympathy with the scene before her even to smile. She retained his hand a moment, and turned to the dead, saying in an under-tone, 'See here?'

'I see,' he said. 'Can I be of service?'

'The poor thing died last night,' said Nina. 'I suppose some one might help about a funeral, Harry,' she said, walking softly towards the door, and speaking low. 'You provide a coffin, have it made neatly. Uncle,' she said, motioning Tiff towards her, 'where would they have her buried?'

'Buried?' said Tiff, 'O Lord! buried!' and he covered his face with his hard hands, and the tears ran through his finger. 'Lord, Lord! Well, it must come, I know, but 'pears like I couldn't! Laws, she's so beautiful! Don't to-day, don't!'

'Indeed, uncle,' said Nina, tenderly, 'I'm sorry I grieved you; but you know, poor fellow, that must come.'

'I's known her ever since she's dat high!' said Tiff. 'Her har was curly, and she used to war' such pretty red shoes, and come running after me in de garden! "Tiff! Tiff!" she used to say—and dar she is now, and 's troubles brought her dar! Lord, wh a pretty gal she was! pretty as you be, Miss Nina. But since she married dat ar,' pointing with his thumb over his shoulder, and speaking confidentially, 'everything' went wrong. I's 'ld her up—did all I could; and now here she is!'

'Perhaps,' said Nina, laying her hand on his, 'perhaps she's in a better place than this.'

'O Lord, dat she is! She told me dat when she died. She saw de Lord at last—she did so! Dem's her last words. "Tiff," she says, "I see Him, and He will give me rest. Tiff," she says, "I'd been asleep, you know, and I kinder felt something cold on my hand, and I woke up right sudden, and dar she was, her" so bright, looking at me and breathing so hard; and all she 'v was, "Tiff, I've seen Him, and I know now why I've suffered." He's gwine to take me, and give me rest!'"

'Then, my poor fellow, you ought to rejoice that she is safe.'

'Deed I does,' said Tiff; 'yet I's selfish. I wants to be dere, too, I does; only I has de chil'en to care for.'

'Well, my good fellow,' said Nina, 'we must leave you now. Harry will see about a coffin for your poor mistress, and whenever the funeral is to be, our carriage will come over, and we will all attend.'

'Lord bless you, Miss Gordon! Dat ar too good on ye! My heart's been most broke tinkin' nobody cared for my poor young mistress! you's too good, dat you is!' Then, drawing nearest, her, and sinking his voice, he said, 'Bout de mourning, 'ere Nina; he an't no 'count, you know—body can see how it is 'tween him very plain. But Missis was a Peyton, you know; an' soe, a Peyton, too. I naturally feels a 'sponsibility he couldn't 'spected fur to. I's took de ribbons off of Miss Fanny's bobair and done de best I could, trimmin' it up with black crape 'tween Milly gave me; and I's got a band of black crape on ma'-Teddy's hat; and I 'lowed to put one on mine, but there was quite enough. You know, missis, old family servants always wars mourning. If missis just be pleased to look over my work! Now, dis yer is Miss Fanny's bennet. You know I can't be spected for to make it like a milliner.'

'They are very well indeed, uncle Tiff.'

'Perhaps, Miss Nina, you can kind of touch it over.'

'O, if you like, uncle Tiff, I'll take them all home, and do them for you.'

'The Lord bless you, Miss Gordon! Dat ar was just what I wanted, but was most-fraid to ask you. Some gay young ladies doesn't like to handle black!'

'Ah! uncle Tiff. I've no fears of that sort; so put it in the vagon, and let Milly take it home.'

So saying, she turned and passed out of the door where Harry was standing, holding the horses. A third party might have seen, by the keen, rapid glance with which his eye rested upon Clayton, that he was measuring the future probability which might make him the arbiter of his own destiny—the disposer of all that was dear to him in life. As for Nina, although the day before a thousand fancies and coquetries would have coloured the manner of her meeting with Clayton, yet now she was so impressed by what she had witnessed, that she scarcely appeared to know that she had met him. She placed her pretty foot on his hand, and let him lift her on to the saddle, scarcely noticing the act, except by a serious, graceful inclination of her head. One great reason of the ascendancy which Clayton had thus far gained over her was, that his nature, so quiet, speculative, and undemonstrative, always left her such perfect liberty to follow the more varying moods of her own. A man of a different mould would have sought to awake her out of the trance—would have remarked on her abstracted manner, or rallied her on her silence. Clayton merely mounted his horse and rode quietly by her side, while Harry, passing on before them, was soon out of sight.

CHAPTER XI.

THE LOVERS.

THEY rode on in silence till their horses' feet again spattered on the clear pebbly water of the stream. Here Nina checked her horse, and pointing round the circles of pine forests, and up the cream, overhung with bending trees and branches, said, 'Hush! listen!' Both stopped, and heard the swaying of the pine-trees, the babble of the waters, the cawing of distant crows, and the tapping of the woodpecker.

'How beautiful everything is!' she said. 'It seems to me so sad that people must die! I never saw anybody dead before, and you don't know how it makes me feel. To think that poor woman was just such a girl as I am, and used to be just so full of life, and never thought any more than I do that she would lie there all cold and dead! Why is it that things are made so beautiful if we must die?'

'Remember what you said to the old man, Miss Nina. Perhaps she sees more beautiful things now.'

'In heaven? Yes. I wish we knew more about heaven, so that it would seem natural and home-like to us, as this world does. As for me, I can't feel that I ever want to leave this world, I enjoy living so much. I can't forget how cold her hand was; I never felt anything like that cold.'

In all the varying moods of Nina, Clayton had never seen anything that resembled this. But he understood the peculiar singleness and earnestness of nature which made one idea or impression for a time absolute in her mind. They turned their horses into the wood path, and rode on in silence.

'Do you know,' said she, 'it's such a change coming from New York to live here? Everything is so unformed, so wild, and so lovely! I never saw anything so lonesome as these woods are. Here you can ride miles and miles, hours and hours, and hear nothing but the swaying of the pine-trees, just as you hear it now. Our place (you never were there were you?) stands all by itself, miles from any other; and I've been for so many years used to a thickly-settled country, that it seems very strange to me. I can't help thinking things look rather deserted and desolate here. It makes me rather sober and sad. I don't know as you'll like the appearance of our place. A great many things are going to decay about it; and yet there are some things that can't decay; for papa was very fond of trees and shrubbery, and we have a good deal more of them than usual. Are you fond of trees?'

'Yes, I'm almost a tree-worshipper. I've no respect for a man who can't appreciate a tree. The only good thing I ever heard of Xerxes was, that he was so transported with the beauty of a pine-tree, that he hung it with chains of gold. This is a little poetical island in the barbarism of those days.'

'Xerxes,' said Nina. 'I believe I studied something about him in that dismal, tedious history, at Madame Ardaine's, but nothing so interesting as that, I'm sure. But what should he hang gold chains on a tree for?'

'Twas the best way he knew of expressing his good opinion.'

'Do you know,' said Nina, half-checking her horse suddenly, 'that I never had the least idea that these men were alive that we read about in these histories, or that they had any feelings like ours? We always studied the lessons and learnt the hard names, and how forty thousand were killed on one side and fifty thousand on the other; and we don't know any more about it than if we never had. That's the way we girls studied at school, except a few "poky" ones, who wanted to be learned, or meant to be teachers.'

'An interesting résumé, certainly,' said Clayton, laughing.

'But how strange it is,' said Nina, 'to think that all those folks we read about are alive now, doing something somewhere! and I got to wondering where they are—Xerxes, and Alexander, and the rest of them. Why, they were so full of life they kept everything in commotion while in this world, and I wonder if they have been keeping a-going ever since. Perhaps Xerxes has been looking round at our trees—nobody knows. But here we are coming now to the beginning of our grounds. There, you see that holly-hedge—mamma had that set out. She travelled in England, and liked the hedges there so much that she thought she would see what could be done with our American holly; so she had these brought from the woods and planted. You see it all grows wild now, because it hasn't been cut for many years. And this live-oak avenue my grandfather set out. It's my pride and delight.'

As she spoke a pair of broad gates swung open, and they cantered in beneath the twilight arches of the oaks. Long wreaths of pearly moss hung swinging from the branches, and, although the sun now was at high noon, a dewy, dreamy coolness seemed to rustle through all the leaves. As Clayton passed in, he took off his hat, as he had often done in foreign countries in cathedrals.

'Welcome to Canema!' said she, riding up to him, and joking up frankly into his face. The air, half-queenly, half-childish, with which this was said, was acknowledged by Clayton with a grave smile, as he replied, bowing,—

'Thank you, madam.'

'Perhaps,' she added, in a grave tone, 'you'll be sorry that you ever came here.'

'What do you mean by that?' he replied.

'I don't know; it just came into my head to say it. We none of us ever know what's going to come of what we do.'

At this instant a violent clamour, like the cawing of a crow, rose on one side of the avenue; and the moment after Tomtit appeared, caracoling and cutting a somerset; his curls flying, his cheeks glowing. 'Why, Tomtit, what upon earth is this for?' said Nina.

'Laws, missis, dere's been a gen'elman waiting for you at the house these two hours. And missis, she's done got on her best cap, and gone down in the parlour for him.'

Nina felt herself blush to the roots of her hair, and was vexed and provoked to think she did so. Involuntarily her eyes met Clayton's. But he expressed neither curiosity nor concern.

'What a pretty drapery this light moss makes!' said he. 'I wasn't aware that it grew so high up in the State.'

'Yes, it is very pretty,' said Nina, abstractedly.

Clayton, however, had noticed both the message and the blush, and was not so ill-informed as Nina supposed as to the whole affair, having heard from a New York correspondent of the probability that a rival might appear upon the field about this time. He was rather curious to watch the development produced by this event. They paced up the avenue, conversing in disconnected intervals till they came out on the lawn which fronted the mansion—a large, grey, three-story building, surrounded on the four sides by wide balconies of wood. Access was had to the lower of these by a broad flight of steps. And there Nina saw, plain enough, her aunt Nesbit in all the proprieties of cap and silk gown, sitting, making the agreeable to Mr. Carson. Mr. Frederick Augustus Carson was one of those nice little epitomes of conventional society which appear to such advantage in factitious life, and are so out of place in the undress, sincere surroundings of country life. Nina had liked his society extremely well in the drawing-rooms and opera-houses of New York. But in the train of thought inspired by the lovely and secluded life she was now leading, it seemed to her an absolute impossibility that she could, even in coquetry and in sport, have allowed such an one to set up pretensions to her hand and heart. She was vexed with herself that she had done so, and therefore not in the most amiable mood for a meeting. Therefore, when, on ascending the steps, he rushed precipitately forward, and, offering his hand, called her Nina, she was ready to die with vexation. She observed, too, a peculiar swelling and rustling of aunt Nesbit's plumage—an indescribable air of tender satisfaction, peculiar to elderly ladies who are taking an interest in an affair of the heart, which led her to apprehend that the bachelor had commenced operations by declaring his position to her. It was with some embarrassment that Nina introduced Mr. Clayton, whom aunt Nesbit received with a most stately curtsy, and Mr. Carson with a patronising bow.

'Mr. Carson has been waiting for you these two hours,' said aunt Nesbit.

'Very warm riding, Nina,' said Mr. Carson, observing her red cheeks. 'You've been riding too fast, I fear. You must be careful of yourself. I've known people bring on very grave illnesses by over-heating the blood.'

Clayton seated himself near the door, and seemed to be intent on the scene without. And Carson, drawing his chair close to Nina, asked, in a confidential under-tone,—

'Who is that gentleman?'

'Mr. Clayton, of Claytonville,' said Nina, with as much hauteur as she could assume.

'Ah, yes!—Hem! hem! I've heard of the family—a very nice family—a very worthy young man—extremely, I'm told. Shall be happy to make his acquaintance.'

'I beg,' said Nina, rising, 'the gentlemen will excuse me a moment or two.' Clayton replied by a grave bow, while Mr. Carson, with great empressement, handed Nina to the door. The moment it was closed, she stamped with anger in the entry. 'The provoking fool, to take these airs with me! And I, too—I deserve it. What on earth could make me think I could tolerate that man?'

As if Nina's cup were not yet full, aunt Nesbit followed her to her chamber with an air of unusual graciousness.

'Nina, my dear, he has told me all about it; and I assure you I'm very much pleased with him.'

'Told you all about what?' said Nina.

'Why, your engagement, to be sure. I'm delighted to think you've done so well. I think your aunt Maria, and all of them, will be delighted. Takes a weight of care off my mind.'

'I wish you wouldn't trouble yourself about me, or my affairs, aunt Nesbit,' said Nina. 'And as for this old pussycat, with his squeaking boots, I won't have him purring round me, that's certain. So provoking, to take that way towards me! Call me Nina, and talk as though he were lord paramount of me, and everything here! I'll let him know!

'Why, Nina; seems to me this is very strange conduct: I am very much astonished at you.'

'I dare say you are, aunt; I never knew the time I didn't astonish you. But this man I detest.'

'Well, then, my dear, what were you engaged to him for?'

'Engaged, aunt! for pity's sake, do hush. Engaged! I should like to know what a New York engagement amounts to? Engaged at the opera!—engaged for a joke! Why, he was my bouquet-holder. The man is just an opera libretto! He was very useful in his time; but who wants him afterwards?'

'But, my dear Nina, this trifling with gentlemen's hearts!'

'I'll warrant his heart! it's neither sugar nor salt, I'll assure you. I'll tell you what, aunt; he loves good eating, good drinking, nice clothes, nice houses, and good times generally; and he wants a pretty wife as a part of a whole; and he thinks he'll take me; but he is mistaken. Calling me "Nina," indeed! Just let me have a chance of seeing him alone: I'll teach him to call me "Nina!" I'll let him know how things stand!'

'But, Nina, you must confess you've given him occasion for all this.'

'Well, supposing I have? I'll give him occasion for something else, then!'

'Why, my dear,' said aunt Nesbit, 'he came over to know when you'll fix the day to be married!'

'Married! O, my gracious! Just think of the creature's talking about it! Well, it is my fault, as you say; but I'll do the best I can to mend it.'

'Well, I'm really sorry for him!' said aunt Nesbit.

'You are, aunt?—why don't you take him yourself, then? you are as young and good-looking as he is.'

'Nina, how you talk!' said aunt Nesbit, colouring and bridling. 'There was a time when I wasn't bad-looking, to be sure, but that's long since past.'

'O, that's because you always dress in stone-colour and drab,' said Nina, as she stood brushing and arranging her curls. 'Come, now, and go down, aunt, and do the best you can till I make my appearance. After all, as you say, I'm the most to blame. There's no use in being vexed with the old soul; so, aunt, do be as fascinating as you can—see if you can't console him. Only remember how you used to turn off lovers, when you were of my age.'

'And who is this other gentleman, Nina?'

'O, nothing; only he is a friend of mine: a very good man—good enough for a minister, any day, aunt; and not so stupid as good people generally are, either.'

'Well, perhaps you are engaged to him?'

'No, I am not; that is to say, I won't be to anybody. This is an insufferable business. I like Mr. Clayton, because he can let me alone; don't look at me in that abominably delighted way all the time, and dance about, calling me Nina! He and I are very good friends—that's all. I'm not going to have any engagements anywhere.'

'Well, Nina, I'll go down, and you make haste.'

While the gentlemen and aunt Nosbit were waiting in the saloon, Carson made himself extremely happy and at home. It was a large, cool apartment, passing, like a hall, completely through the centre of the house. Long French windows, at either end, opened on to balconies. The pillars of the balconies were draped and garlanded with wreaths of roses, now in full bloom. The floor of the room was the polished mosaic of different colours to which we have formerly alluded. Over the mantel-piece was sculptured, in oak, the Gordon arms. The room was wainscoted with dark wood, and hung with several fine paintings, by Copley and Stuart, of different members of the family. A grand piano, lately arrived from New York, was the most modern-looking article in the room. Most of the furniture was of heavy dark mahogany, of an antique pattern. Clayton sat by the door, still admiring the avenue of oaks which were to be seen across the waving green of the lawn. In about half-an-hour Nina reappeared, in a flossy cloud of muslin, lace, and gauzy ribbons. Dress was one of those accomplishments for which the little gipsy had a natural instinct; and, without any apparent thought, she always fell into that kind of colour and material which harmonized with her style of appearance and character. There was always something floating and buoyant about the arrangement of her garments and drapery; so that to see her move across the floor gave one an airy kind of sensation, like the gambols of thistle-down. Her brown eyes had a peculiar resemblance to a bird's; and this effect was increased by a twinkling notion of the head, and a fluttering habit of movement peculiar to herself; so that when she swept by in rosy gauzes, and laid one ungloved hand lightly on the piano, she seemed to Clayton much like some saucy bird—very good indeed if let alone, but ready to fly on the slightest approach. Clayton had the rare faculty of taking in every available point of observation, without appearing to stare.

‘Pon my word, Nina,’ said Mr. Carson, coming towards her with a most delighted air, ‘you look as if you had fallen out of a rainbow!’

Nina turned away very coolly, and began arranging her music.

‘O, that’s right!’ said Carson, ‘give us one of your songs. Sing something from the “Favorita.” You know it’s my favourite opera,’ said he, assuming a most sentimental expression.

‘O, I’m entirely out of practice—I don’t sing at all. I’m sick of all those opera songs!’ And Nina skimmed across the floor, and out of the open door by which Clayton was lounging, and began busying herself amid the flowers that wreathed the porch. In a moment Carson was at her heels; for he was one of those persons who seem to think it a duty never to allow any one to be quiet, if they can possibly prevent it.

‘Have you ever studied the language of flowers, Nina?’ said he.

‘No, I don’t like to study languages.’

‘You know the signification of a full-blown rose?’ said he, tenderly presenting her with one. Nina took the rose, colouring with vexation, and then, plucking from the bush a rose of two or three days’ bloom, whose leaves were falling out, she handed it to him, and said.

‘Do you understand the signification of this?’

‘O, you have made an unfortunate selection! This rose is all falling to pieces!’ said Mr. Carson, innocently.

‘So I observed,’ said Nina, turning away quickly; then, making one of her darting movements, she was in the middle of the saloon again, just as the waiter announced dinner. Clayton rose gravely, and offered his arm to aunt Nesbit, and Nina found herself obliged to accept the delighted escort of Mr. Carson, who, entirely unperceiving, was in the briskest possible spirits, and established himself comfortably between aunt Nesbit and Nina.

‘You must find it very dull here—very barren country, shockingly so! What do you find to interest yourself in?’ said he.

‘Will you take some of this gumbo?’ replied Nina.

‘I always thought,’ said aunt Nesbit, ‘it was a good plan for girls to have a course of reading marked out for them when they left school.’

‘O certainly,’ said Carson. ‘I shall be happy to mark out one for her. I’ve done it for several young ladies.’

At this moment, Nina accidentally happened to catch Clayton’s eye, which was fixed upon Mr. Carson with an air of quiet amusement greatly disconcerting to her.

‘Now,’ said Mr. Carson, ‘I have no opinion of making blues of young ladies; but still I think, Mrs. Nesbit, that a little useful information adds greatly to their charms. Don’t you?’

‘Yes,’ said Mrs. Nesbit. ‘I’ve been reading Gibbon’s “Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,” lately.’

‘Yes,’ said Nina, ‘aunt’s been busy about that ever since I can remember.’

‘That’s a very nice book,’ said Mr. Carson, looking solemnly at Nina: ‘only, Mrs. Nesbit, an’t you afraid of the infidel principle? I think, in forming the minds of the young, you know, one cannot be too careful.’

‘Why,’ he struck me as a very pious writer!’ said aunt Nesbit, innocently. ‘I’m sure he makes the most religious reflections, all along. I liked him particularly on that account.’

It seemed to Nina that, without looking at Clayton, she was forced to meet his eye. No matter whether she directed her attention to the asparagus or the potatoes, it was her fatality always to end by a rencounter with his eye, and she saw, for some reason or other, the conversation was extremely amusing to him.

‘For my part,’ said Nina, ‘I don’t know what sort of principles aunt Nesbit’s history, there, has; but one thing I’m pretty certain of,—that I’m not in any danger from any such thick, close-printed, old, stupid-looking books as that. I hate reading, and I don’t intend to have my mind formed; so that nobody need trouble themselves to mark out courses for me! What is it to me what all these old empires have been hundreds of years ago? It is as much as I can do to attend to what is going on now.’

‘I’ve always regretted,’ said aunt Nesbit, that I neglected the cultivation of my mind when I was young. I was like Nina here, immersed in vanity and folly.’

‘People always talk,’ said Nina, reddening, ‘as if there ~~was~~ but one kind of vanity and folly in the world. I think there can be as much learned vanity and folly as we girls have!' and she looked at Clayton indignantly, as she saw him laughing.

'I agree with Miss Gordon, entirely. There is a great deal of very stupid respectable trifling, which people pursue under the head of courses of reading,' he said, 'and I don't wonder that most compends of history which are studied in schools should inspire any lively young lady with a life-long horror, not only of history, but of reading.'

'Do you think so?' said Nina, with a look of inexpressible relief.

'I do, indeed,' said Clayton. 'And it would have been a very good thing for many of our historians if they had been obliged to have shaped their histories so that they would interest a lively school-girl. We literary men, then, would have found less sleepy reading. There is no reason why a young lady, who would sit up all night reading a novel, should not be made to sit up all night with a history. I'll venture to say there's no romance can come up to the gorgeousness and splendour, and the dramatic power of things that really have happened. All that's wanting is to have it set before us with an air of reality.'

'But then,' said Nina, 'you'd have to make the history into a romance.'

'Well, a good historical romance is generally truer than a dull history; because it gives some sort of conception of the truth: whereas the dull history gives none.'

'Well, then,' said Nina, 'I'll confess now, that about all the history I do know has been got from Walter Scott's novels. I always told our history-teacher so; but she insisted upon it that it was very dangerous reading.'

'For my part,' said Mrs. Nesbit, 'I've a great horror of novel-reading, particularly for young ladies. It did me a great deal of harm when I was young. It dissipates the mind, and gives false views of life.'

'O law!' said Nina, 'we used to write compositions about that, and I've got it all by heart—how it raises false expectations, and leads people to pursue phantoms, rainbows, and meteors, and all that sort of thing!'

'And yet,' said Clayton, 'all these objections would lie against perfectly true history, and the more so just in proportion to its truth. If the history of Napoleon Bonaparte were graphically and minutely given, it would be open to the very same objections. It would produce the very same cravings for something out of the common-place course of life. There would be the same dazzling mixture of bad and good qualities in the hero, and the same fatigue and exhaustion after the story was finished. And common history does not do this, simply because it is not true—does not produce a vivid impression of the reality as it happened.'

Aunt Nesbit only got an indefinite impression from this harangue, that Clayton was defending novel-reading, and felt herself called to employ her own peculiar line of reasoning to meet it, which consisted in saying the same thing over and over at regular intervals, without appearing to hear or notice anything said in reply. Accordingly, she now drew herself up, with a 'lightly-virtuous air, and said to Mr. Clayton,

'I must say, after all, that I don't approve of novel-reading. It gives false views of life, and disgusts young people with their duties.'

'I was only showing, madam, that the same objection would apply to the best-written history,' said Clayton.

'I think novel-reading does a great deal of harm,' rejoined aunt Nesbit; 'I never allow myself to read any work of fiction. I'm principled against it.'

'I wish I could find that kind of history you are speaking of,' said Nina, 'I believe I could read that.'

'It would be very interesting history, certainly,' said Mr. Farson; 'I should think it would prove a very charming mode of writing. I wonder somebody don't produce one.'

'For my part,' said aunt Nesbit, 'I confine myself entirely to what is practically useful. Useful information is all I desire.'

'Well, I suppose, then, I'm very wicked,' said Nina; 'but I don't like anything useful. Why, I've sometimes thought when I've been in the garden, that the summer-savory, sage, and sweet marjoram were just as pretty as many other flowers; and I don't see any reason why I shouldn't like a sprig of one of them for a bouquet, except that I've seen them used so much in stuffing turkeys. Well, now, that seems very bad of me, doesn't it?'

'That reminds me,' said aunt Nesbit, 'that Rose has been putting sage into this turkey again, after all that I said to her. I believe she does it on purpose.'

At this moment Harry appeared at the door, and requested to speak to Nina. After a few moments' whispered conversation he came back to the table, apparently disconcerted.

'I'm so sorry, so very sorry,' she said, 'Harry has been riding all round the country to find a minister to attend the funeral this evening. It will be such a disappointment to that poor fellow. You know the negroes think so much of having prayers at the grave.'

'If no one else can be found to read prayers, I will,' said Clayton.

'O, thank you; will you, indeed?' said Nina. 'I'm glad of it, now, for poor Tiff's sake. The coach will be out at five o'clock, and we'll ride over together, and make as much of a party as we can.'

'Why, child,' said aunt Nesbit to Nina, after they returned to the parlour, 'I did not know that Mr. Clayton was an Episcopalian.'

'He is not,' said Nina. 'He and his family all attend the Presbyterian church.'

'How strange that he should offer to read prayers!' said aunt Nesbit. 'I don't approve of such things, for my part.'

'Such things as what?'

'Countenancing episcopal errors. If we are right, they are wrong, and we ought not to countenance them.'

'But, aunt, the burial service is beautiful.'

'Don't approve of it,' said aunt Nesbit.

'Why, you know, as Clayton isn't a minister, he would not feel like making an extempore prayer.'

'Shows great looseness of religious principle,' said aunt Nesbit. 'Don't approve of it.'

CHAPTER XII.

EXPLANATIONS.

THE golden arrows of the setting sun were shooting hither and thither through the pine woods, glorifying whatever they touched with a life not its own. A chorus of birds were pouring out an evening melody, when a little company stood around an open grave. With instinctive care for the feeling of the scene, Nina had arrayed herself in a black silk dress, and plain straw bonnet with black ribbon—a mark of respect to the deceased remembered and narrated by Tiff for many a year after. Cripps stood by the head of the grave, with that hopeless, imbecile expression with which a nature wholly gross and animal often contemplates the symbols of the close of mortal existence. Tiff stood by the side of the grave, his white hat conspicuously draped with black crape, and a deep weed of black upon his arm. The baby, wrapped in an old black shawl, was closely fondled in his bosom, while the two children stood weeping bitterly at his side. On the other side of the grave stood Mr. Carson and Mr. Clayton, while Milly, Harry, and several plantation slaves were in a group behind. The coffin had been opened, that all might take that last look, so coveted, yet so hopeless, which the human heart will grave on the very verge of the grave: It was but a moment since the coffin had been closed; and the burst of grief which shook the children was caused by that last farewell. As Clayton, in a musical voice, pronounced the words, "I am the resurrection and the life," Nina wept and sobbed as if the grief had been her own; nor did she cease to weep during the whole touching service. It was the same impulsive nature which made her so sympathetic in other scenes that made her so sympathetic here. When the whole was over, she kissed the children, and shaking hands with old Tiff, promised to come and see them on the morrow. After which Clayton led her to the carriage, into which he and Carson followed her.

'Upon my word,' said Carson, briskly, 'this has been quite solemn! Really a very interesting funeral indeed! I was delighted with the effect of our church-service; in such a romantic place, too! It was really very interesting. It pleases me, also, to see young ladies in your station, Nina, interest themselves in the humble concerns of the poor. If young ladies knew how much more attractive it made them to show a charitable spirit, they would cultivate it more. Singular-looking person that old negro! Seems to be a good creature. Interesting children, too. I should think the woman must have been pretty when she was young. Seen a great deal of trouble, no doubt, poor thing! It's a comfort to hope she is better off now.'

Nina was filled with indignation at this monologue; not considering that the man was giving the very best he had in him, and labouring assiduously at what he considered his vocation, the prevention of half an hour of silence in any spot of earth where he could possibly make himself heard. The same excitement which made Nina cry made him talk. But he was not content with talking, but insisted upon asking Nina; every moment, if she didn't think it an interesting occasion, and if she had not been so much impressed.

'I don't feel to like talking, Mr. Carson,' said Nina.

'O—ah—yes, indeed! You've been so deeply affected. Yes. Naturally does incline one to silence. Understand your feelings, perfectly. Very gratifying to me to see you take such a deep interest in your fellow-creatures.'

Nina could have pushed him out of the carriage.

'For my part,' continued Carson, 'I think we don't reflect enough about this kind of things. I positively don't. It really is useful sometimes to have one's thoughts turned in this direction. It does us good.'

Thus glibly did Carson proceed to talk away the impression of the whole scene they had witnessed. Long before the carriage reached home, Nina had forgotten all her sympathy in a tumult of vexation. She discovered an increasing difficulty in making Carson understand, by any degree of coolness, that he was not acceptable, and saw nothing before her but explanations in the very plainest terms, mortifying and humiliating as that might be. His perfect self-complacent ease, and the air with which he constantly seemed to appropriate her as something which of right belonged to himself, filled her with vexation. But yet her conscience told her that she had brought it upon herself.

'I won't bear this another hour!' she said to herself, as she ascended the steps toward the parlor. 'All this before Clayton, too! What must he think of me?'

But they found tea upon the table, and aunt Nesbit waiting.

'It's a pity, madam, you were not with us. Such an interesting time!' said Mr. Carson, launching with great volubility into the tide of discourse.

'It wouldn't have done for me at all,' said Mrs. Nesbit. 'Being out when the dew falls, always brings on hoarseness. I have been troubled in that way these two or three years. Now I have to be very careful. Then I'm timid about riding in a carriage with John's driving.'

'I was amused enough,' said Nina, 'with Old Hundred's indignation at having to get out the carriage and horses to go over to what he called a cracker funeral! I really believe if he could have upset us without hurting himself, he would have done it.'

'For my part,' said aunt Nesbit, 'I hope that family will move off before long. It's very disagreeable having such people round.'

'The children look very pretty and bright,' said Nina.

'O, there's no hope for them! They'll grow up and be just like their parents. I've seen that sort of people all through and through. I don't wish them any evil; only I don't want to have anything to do with them.'

'I'm sorry for them,' said Nina. 'I wonder why the legislature, or somebody, don't have schools, as they do up in New York state? There isn't anywhere there where children can't go to school, if they wish to. Besides, aunt, these children really came from an old family in Virginia. Their old servant-man says, that their mother was a Peyton.'

'I don't believe a word of it! They'll lie—all of them; they always do.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I shall do something for these children at any rate.'

'I quite agree with you, Nina. It shows a very excellent spirit in you,' said Mr. Carson. 'You'll always find me ready to encourage everything of that sort.'

Nina frowned, and looked indignant; but to no purpose. Mr. Carson went on remorselessly with his really good-hearted rattle, till Nina, at last, could bear it no longer.

'How dreadfully warm this room is,' said she, springing up. 'Come, let's go back into the parlor.'

Nina was as much annoyed at Clayton's silence, and his quiet, observant reserve, as with Carson's forth-putting. Rising from table, she passed on before the company, with a half-flying trip, into the hall, which lay now 'cool, calm, and breezy, in the twilight, with the odor of the pillar-roses floating in at the window. The pale white moon, set in the rosy belt of the evening sky, looked in at the open door. Nina would have given all the world to be still; but, well aware that stillness was out of the question, she determined to select her own noise; and sitting down at the piano, began playing very fast, in a rapid, restless, disconnected manner. Clayton threw himself on a lounge by the open door; while Carson busied himself fluttering the music, opening and shutting the music-books, and interspersing running commentaries and notes of admiration on the playing. At last, as if she could bear it no longer, she rose, with a very decided air from the piano, and facing about towards Mr. Carson, said:

'It looks very beautiful out of doors. Don't you want to come out? There's a point of view at the end of one of the paths, where the moon looks on the water, that I should like to show you.'

'Won't you catch cold, Nina?' said aunt Nesbit.

'No, indeed; I never catch cold,' said Nina, springing into the porch, and taking the delighted Mr. Carson's arm. And away she went with him, with almost a skip and a jump, leaving Clayton tête-à-tête with aunt Nesbit. Nina went so fast that her attendant was almost out of breath. They reached a little knoll, and there Nina stopped suddenly, and said,—

'Look here, Mr. Carson; I have something to say to you.'

'I should be delighted, my dear Nina! I'm perfectly charmed!'

'No—no—if you please—don't!' said Nina, putting up her hand to stop him. 'Just wait till you hear what I have to say. I believe you did not get a letter which I wrote you a few days ago, did you?'

'A letter! no, indeed. How unfortunate!'

'Very unfortunate for me,' said Nina, 'and for you too; because, if you had, it would have saved you and me the trouble of this interview. I wrote that letter to tell you, Mr. Carson, that I cannot think of such a thing as an engagement with you! That I've acted very wrong and very foolishly; but that I cannot do it. In New York, where everybody and everything seemed to be trifling, and where the girls all trifled with these things, I was engaged—just for a frolic, nothing more. I had no idea what it would amount to; no idea what I was saying, nor how I should feel afterwards. But every hour since I've been home, here—since I've been so much alone—has made me feel how wrong it is. Now, I'm very sorry, I'm sure; but I must speak the truth this time. But it is—I can't tell you how—disagreeable to me to have you treat me as you have since you've been here.'

'Miss Gordon!' said Mr. Carson, 'I am positively astonished! I—I don't know—what to think!'

'Well, I only want you to think that I am in earnest; and that, though I can like you very well as an acquaintance, and shall always wish you well, yet anything else is just as far out of the question as that moon there is from us. I can't tell you how sorry I am that I've made you all this trouble—I really am,' said she, good-naturedly; 'but please now to understand how we stand.' She turned, and tripped away. 'There!' said she to herself, 'at any rate I've done one thing.'

Mr. Carson stood still, gradually recovering from the stupor into which this communication had thrown him. He stretched himself, rubbed his eyes, took out his watch and looked at it, and then began walking off with a very sober pace in the opposite direction from Nina. Happily-constituted mortal that he was, nothing ever could be subtracted from his sum of complacency that could not be easily balanced by about a quarter of an hour's consideration. The walk through the shrubbery in which he was engaged was an extremely pretty one, and wound along on the banks of the river, through many picturesque points of view, and finally led again to the house by another approach. During the course of this walk, Mr. Carson had settled the whole question for himself. In the first place, he repeated the comfortable old proverb, that there were as good fish in the sea as ever were caught. In the second place, as Mr. Carson was a shrewd business-man, it occurred to him, in this connection, that the plantation was rather run down, and not a profitable acquisition. And, in the third place, contemplating Nina as the fox of old did his bunch of sour grapes, he began to remember that, after all, she was dressy, expensive, and extravagant. Then, as he did not want in that imperturbable good-nature which belongs to a very shallow capability of feeling, he said to himself that he shouldn't like the girl a bit the less. In fact, when he thought of his own fine fortune, his house in New York, and all the accessories which went to make up himself, he considered her, on the whole, as an object of pity; and by the time that he ascended the balcony-steps again, he was in as charitable and Christian a frame as any rejected suitor could desire. He entered the drawing-room. Aunt Nesbit had ordered candles, and was sitting up with her gloves on, alone. What had transpired during his walk, he did not know; but we will take our readers into confidence. Nina returned to the house with the same decided air with which she went out, and awakened Mr. Clayton from a reverie with a brisk little tap of her fan on his shoulder.

'Come up here with me,' she said, 'and look out of the library-window, and see this moonlight.' And up she went, over the old oaken staircase, stopping on each landing; and, beckoning to Clayton, with a whimsically authoritative gesture, threw open the door of a large, black-wainscoted room, and ushered him in. The room was just above the one where they had been sitting, and, like that, opened on to the veranda by long-sashed windows, through which, at the present moment, a flood of moonlight was pouring. A large mahogany writing-table, covered with papers, stood in the middle of the room, and the moon shone in so brightly, that the pattern of the bronze inkstand, and the colour of the wafers and sealing-wax, were plainly revealed. The window commanded a splendid view of the river over the distant tree-tops, as it lay skimming and glittering in the moonlight.

‘Isn’t that a beautiful sight?’ said Nina, in a hurried voice.

‘Very beautiful!’ said Clayton, sitting down in the large lounging-chair before the window, and looking out with the abstracted air which was habitual with him.

After a moment’s thought, Nina added, with a sudden effort, ‘But, after all, that was not what I wanted to speak to you about. I wanted to see you somewhere, and say a few words which it seems to me it is due to you that I should say. I got your last letter, and I’m sure I am very much obliged to your sister for all the kind things she says; but I think you must have been astonished at what you have seen since you have been here.’

‘Astonished at what?’ said Clayton, quietly.

‘At Mr. Carson’s manners towards me.’

‘I have not been astonished at all,’ replied Clayton, quietly.

‘I think, at all events,’ said Nina, ‘I think it is no more than honourable that I should tell you exactly how things have stood. Mr. Carson has thought that he had a right to me and mine. And I was so foolish as to give him reason to think so. The fact is, that I have been making a game of life, and saying and doing anything and everything that came into my head, just for frolic. It don’t seem to me that there has been anything serious or real about me, until very lately. Somehow, my acquaintance with you has made things seem more real to me than they ever did before. And it seems to me now perfectly incredible, the way we girls used to play and trifle with everything in the world. Just for sport, I was engaged to that man; just for sport, too, I have been engaged to another.’

‘And,’ said Clayton, breaking the silence, ‘just for sport, have you been engaged to me?’

‘No,’ said Nina, after a few moments’ silence, ‘not in sport, certainly; but yet, not enough in earnest. I think I am about half-waked up. I don’t know myself, I don’t know where or what I am, and I want to go back into that thoughtless dream. I do really think it’s too hard to take up the responsibility of living in good earnest. Now, it seems to me just this—that I cannot be bound to anybody. I want to be free. I have positively broken all connection with Mr. Carson. I have broken with another, and I wish—

‘To break with me?’ said Clayton.

‘I don’t really know that I can say what I do wish. It is a very different thing from any of the others, but there's a feeling of dread, and responsibility, and constraint about it; and, though I think I should feel very lonesome now without you, and though I like to get your letters, yet it seems to me that I cannot be engaged—that is a most dreadful feeling to me!

'My dear friend,' said Clayton, 'if that is all, make yourself easy. There's no occasion for our being engaged. If you can enjoy being with me and writing to me, why do it in the freest way, and to-morrow shall take care for the things of itself. You shall say what you please, do what you please, write when you please, and not write when you please, and have as many or as few letters as you like. There can be no true love without liberty.'

'O, I'm sure I'm much obliged to you!' said Nina, with a sigh of relief. 'And now, do you know, I like your sister's postscript very much; but I can't tell what it is in it, for the language is as kind as can be, that would give me the impression that she is one of those very proper kind of people that would be dreadfully shocked if she knew of all my goings on in New York.'

Clayton could hardly help laughing at the instinctive sagacity of this remark.

'I'm sure I don't know,' said he, 'where you could have seen that,—in so short a postscript too.'

'Do you know—I never take anybody's handwriting into my hand, that I don't feel an idea of them come over me, just as you have when you see people; and that idea came over me when I read your sister's letter.'

'Well, Nina, to tell you the truth, sister Anne is a little bit conventional—a little set in her ways; but, after all, a large-hearted, warm-hearted woman. You would like each other, I know.'

'I don't know about that,' said Nina. 'I am very apt to shock proper people. Somehow or other they have a faculty of making me contrary.'

'Well, but you see, Anne is not merely a conventional person; there's only the slightest crust of conventionality, and a real warm heart under it.'

'Whereas,' said Nina, 'most conventional people are like a shallow river, frozen to the bottom. But now, really, I should like very much to have your sister come and visit us, if I could think that she would come as any other friend; but, you know it isn't very agreeable to have anybody come to "look one over to see if one will do."' Clayton laughed at the naïve, undisguised frankness of this speech. 'You see,' said Nina, 'though I'm nothing but an ignorant school-girl, I'm as proud as if I had everything to be proud of. Now, do you know, I don't much like writing to your sister, because I don't think I write very good letters; I never could sit still long enough to write.'

'Write exactly as you talk,' said Clayton. 'Say just what comes into your head, just as you would talk it. I hope you will do that much, for it will be very dull writing all on one side.'

'Well,' said Nina, rising with animation, 'now, Mr. Edward Clayton, if we have settled about this moonlight, we may as well go down into the parlor, where aunt Nesbit and Mr. Carson are tête-à-tête.'

'Poor Carson!' said Clayton.

'O, don't pity him! good soul! he's a man that one night's rest would bring round from anything in creation. He's so thoroughly good-natured! Besides, I shall like him better now. He did not use to seem to me so intrusive and disagreeable. We girls used to like him very well; he was such a comfortable, easy-tempered, agreeable creature, always brisk and in spirits, and knowing everything that went on. But he is one of those men that I think would be really insufferable, if anything serious were the matter with one. Now, you heard how he talked, coming from that funeral! Do you know, that if he had been coming from my funeral, it would have been just so?'

'O, no, not quite so bad,' said Clayton.

'Indeed he is,' said Nina. 'That man! why, he just puts me in mind of one of those brisk blue flies, whirring and whisking about, marching over pages of books, and alighting on all sorts of things. When he puts on that grave look, and begins to talk about serious things, he actually looks to me just as a fly does when he stands brushing his wings on a Bible! But come, let's go down to the good soul.'

Down they went, and Nina seemed like a person enfranchised. Never had she seemed more universally gracious. She was chatty and conversable with Carson, and sang over for him all her old opera-songs, with the better grace that she saw that Clayton was listening intently. As they were sitting and conversing together, the sound of horses' heels was heard coming up the avenue.

'Who can that be, this time of night?' said Nina, springing to the door, and looking out. She saw Harry hastening in advance to meet her, and ran down the veranda steps to speak to him. 'Harry, who is coming?'

'Miss Nina, it's Master Tom,' said Harry, in a low voice.

'Tom! O, mercy!' said Nina, in a voice of apprehension.

'What sent him here now?'

'What sends him anywhere?' said Harry.

Nina re-ascended the steps, and stood looking apprehensively towards the horseman, who approached every moment nearer. Harry came upon the veranda, and stood a little behind her. In a few moments the horse was up before the steps.

'Hallo, there!' said the rider. 'Come, take my horse, you rascal.'

Harry remained perfectly still, put his arms by his side, and stood with a frowning expression on his forehead.

'Don't you hear?' said the horseman, throwing himself off, with an oath. 'Come here, boy, and take my horse.'

'For pity's sake,' said Nina, turning and looking in Harry's face, 'don't have a scene here. Do take his horse quick! Anything to keep him quiet!'

With a sudden start, Harry went down the steps and took the bridle from the hand of the newly-arrived, in silence. The horseman sprang up the steps.

"Hallo, Nin, is this you?" And Nina felt herself roughly seized in the arms of a shaggy great coat, and kissed by lips smelling of brandy and tobacco. She faintly said, as she disengaged herself—

'Tom, is it you?'

'Yes, to be sure! who did you think it was? Devilish glad to see me, an't you? Suppose you was in hopes I wouldn't come?'

'Hush, Tom, do! I am glad to see you. There are gentlemen in there; don't speak so loud.'

'Some of your beaux, hey? Well, I am as good a fellow as any of 'em! Free country, I hope! No, I an't going to whisper for any of them. So now, Nin—If there isn't old Starchy, to be sure!' said he, as aunt Nesbit came to the door. 'Hallo, old girl, how are you?'

'Thomas,' said Mrs. Nesbit, softly, 'Thomas.'

'None of your Thomasing me, you old pussy-cat! Don't you be telling me, neither, to hush! I won't hush neither. I know what I am about, I guess! It's my house as much as it is Nin's, and I'm going to do as I've a mind to here! I an't going to have my mouth shut on account of her beaux; so, clear out, I tell you, and let me come in.' And aunt Nesbit gave back.

He pushed his way into the apartment. He was a young man, about twenty-five years old, who evidently had once possessed advantages of face and figure; but every outline in the face was bloated and rendered unmeaning by habits of constant intemperance. His dark eyes had that muddy and troubled expression which in a young man too surely indicates the habitual consciousness of inward impurity. His broad, high forehead was flushed and pimpled, his lips swollen and tumid, and his whole air and manner gave painful evidence that he was at present too far under the influence of stimulants justly to apprehend what he was about. Nina followed him, and Clayton was absolutely shocked at the ghastly paleness of her face. She made an uncertain motion towards him, as if she would have gone to him for protection. Clayton rose, Carson also, and all stood for a moment in silent embarrassment.

'Well, this is a pretty business, to be sure! Nina,' said he, turning to her with a tremendous oath, 'why don't you introduce me? Pretty way to meet a brother you haven't seen for three or four years! You act as if you were ashamed of me. Confound it all! Introduce me, I say!'

'Tom, don't speak so,' said Nina, laying her hand on his arm, in a soothing tone. 'This gentleman is Mr. Clayton; and, Mr. Clayton,' she said, lifting her eyes to him, and speaking in a trembling voice, 'this is my brother.' Mr. Clayton offered his hand with the ordinary expressions of civility. 'Mr. Carson,' said Nina, 'my brother.'

There was something inexpressibly touching and affecting in the manner in which this was said. One other person noticed it. Harry, who had given the horse to the servants, stood leaning against the doorway, looking on. A fiery gleam, like that of a steel blade, seemed to shoot from his blue eyes; and each time that Nina said 'my brother,' he drew in his breath, as one who seeks to restrain himself in some violent inward emotion.!

'I suppose you don't any of you want to see me much,' said the new-comer, taking a chair, and sitting down doggedly in the centre of the group, with his hat on his head. 'Well, I've as good a right as anybody to be here,' he continued, spitting a quid of tobacco at aunt Nesbit's feet. 'For my part, I think relations ought to have natural affection, and be glad to see one another. Well, now, you can see, gentlemen, with your own eyes just how it is here. There's my sister, there. You better believe me, she hasn't seen me for three years! Instead of appearing glad, or anything, there she sits, all curled up in a corner; won't come near me more than if I had the plague! Come here, now, you little kit, and sit in my lap.'

He made a movement to pull Nina towards him, which she resisted with an air of terror, looking at her aunt, who, more terrified still, sat with her feet drawn up on the sofa, as if he had been a mad dog. There was reason enough for the terror which seemed to possess them both. Both had too vivid recollections of furious domestic hurricanes that had swept over the family when Tom Gordon came home. Nina remembered the storms of oaths and curses that had terrified her when a child: the times that she had seen her father looking like death, leaning his head on his hand, and sighing as only those sigh who have an only son worse than dead. It is no wonder, therefore, that Nina, generally courageous and fearless as she was, should have become fearful and embarrassed at his sudden return.

'Tom,' she said, softly, coming up to him, 'you havn't been to supper; hadn't you better come out?'

'No, you won't,' said he, catching her round the waist, and drawing her on his knee; you won't get me out of the room, now. I know what I'm about! Tell me,' continued he, still holding her on his knee, 'which of them is it, Nin? which is the favoured one?'

Clayton rose and went out on the veranda, and Mr. Carson asked Harry to show him into his room.

'Hallo! shelling out there, are they? Well, Nin, to tell the truth, I am deuced hungry. For my part, I don't see what the thunder keeps my Jim out so long. I sent him across to the post-office. He ought to have been back certainly as soon as I was. O, here he comes. Hallo! you dog, there!' cried he, going to the door, where a very black negro was dismounting. 'Any letters?'

'No, mas'r, I 'spect de mails have gin up. Der an't been no letters dere for no one for a month. It is some 'quatic disorganization of dese yer creeks, I s'pose, so de letter-bags goes anywhere 'cept der right place.'

'Confound it all! I say, you Nin,' turning round, 'why don't you offer a fellow some supper? Coming home, here, in my own father's house, everybody acts as if they were scared to death. No supper!'

'Why, Tom, I've been asking you these three or four times.'

'Bless us,' said Jim, whispering to Harry, 'de mischief is, he an't more than half-primed. Tell her to give him a little more brandy, and after a little, we will get him into bed as easy as can be.'

And the event proved so; for, on sitting down to supper, Tom Gordon passed regularly through all the stages of drunkenness; became as outrageously affectionate as he had been before surly; kissed Nina and aunt Nesbit; cried over his sins and confessed his iniquities; laughed and cried feebly, till at last he sank in his chair asleep.

'Dar, he is done for, now!' said Jim, who had been watching the gradual process. 'Now, just you and I, let's tote him off,' said he to Harry.

Nina, on her part, retired to a troubled pillow. She foresaw nothing before her but mortification and embarrassment, and realized more than ever the peculiar loneliness of her situation. For all purposes of consultation and aid, aunt Nesbit was nobody in her esteem, and Nina was always excited and vexed by every new attempt that she made to confide in her. 'Now to-morrow,' she said to herself, as she lay down, 'no one knows what will turn up. He will go round as usual, interfering with everything—threatening and frightening my servants, and getting up some difficulty or other with Harry. Dear me! it seems to me life is coming over me hard enough, and all at once, too.'

As Nina said this, she saw some one standing by her bed. It was Milly, who stooped tenderly over her, smoothing and arranging the bed-clothes in a motherly way.

'Is that you, Milly? O, sit down here a minute. I am so troubled! It seems to me I've had so much trouble to-day! Do you know Tom came home to night so drunk! O, dear Milly, it was horrid! Do you know he took me in his arms and kissed me; and though he is my only brother, it's perfectly dreadful to me! And I feel so worried and so anxious!'

'Yes, lamb, I know all about dese yer things,' said Milly. 'I've seen him many and many times.'

'The worst of it is,' said Nina, 'that I don't know what he will do to-morrow—and before Mr. Clayton, too! It makes me feel so helpless, ashamed, and mortifies me so!'

'Yes, yes, chile,' said Milly, gently stroking her head.

'I stand so much alone,' said Nina. 'Other girls have some friend or relation to lean on; but I have nobody!'

'Why don't you ask your Father to help you?' said Milly to Nina, in a gentle tone.

'Ask who?' said Nina, lifting up her head from the pillow.

'Your Father!' said Milly, with a voice of solemnity. 'Don't you know "Our Father who art in heaven?" You haven't forgot your prayers, I hope, honey.' Nina looked at her with surprise, and Milly continued—'Now, if I was you, lamb, I would tell my Father all about it. Why, chile, He loves you! He wouldn't like nothing better, now, than to have you just come to Him and tell Him all about your troubles, and He'll make 'em all straight. Dat's de way I does; and I's found it come out right, many and many a time.'

'Why, Milly, you wouldn't have me go to God about my little foolish affairs?'

'Laws, chile, what should you go to Him 'bout, den? Sure dese are all de 'fairs you's got.'

'Well, but Milly,' said Nina, apprehensively, 'you know I've been a very bad girl about religion. It's years and years since I've said any prayers. At school the girls used to laugh at anybody who said prayers; and so I never did. And since I've neglected my heavenly Father when things went well with me, it wouldn't be well to call on Him now, just because I've got into trouble. I don't think it would be honourable.'

'De Lord bless dis yer chile! Do hear her talk! Just as if de heavenly Father didn't know all about you, and hadn't been a loving and watching you de whole time! Why, chile, He knows what poor, foolish creatures we be; and He an't nowadays surprised, nor put out. Why, laws, don't ye know he's de Good Shepherd? And what you suppose dey has shepherds fur, 'cept de sheeps are all de time running away, and getting into trouble? Why, honey, dat's what deys fur.'

'Well, but it is so long since I prayed, that I don't know anything how to pray, Milly.'

'Bless you, chile, who wanted you to pray? I never prays myself. Used to try, but I made such drefful poor work on it, that I gin it up. Now, I just goes and talks to de Father, and tells Him anything and everything; and I think He likes it a great deal better. Why, He is just as willing to hear me now, as if I was de greatest lady in de land. And He takes such an interest in all my poor 'fairs! Why, sometimes I go to Him when my heart is so heavy, and when I tells Him all about it, I comes away as light as a feather.'

'Well, but, after I've forgotten him so many years!'

'Why, honey, now just look yere! I'member once, when you was a little weety thing, that you toddles down dem steps dere, and you slips away from dem dat was watching you, and you toddles away off into de grove yonder, and dere you got picking flowers, and one thing and another, mighty tickled and peart. You was down dere 'joying yourself, till, by-and-by, your pa missed you; and den such another hunt as dere was! Dere was a hurrying here, and a looking dere; and finally your pa run down in the woods, and dere you'd got stuck fast in de mud, both your shoes off, and well scratched with briers; and dere you stood a crying, and calling your pa. I tell you he said dat ar was de sweetest music he ever heard in his life. I 'member he picked you up, and came up to de house kissing you. Now, dere 'twas, honey! You didn't call on your pa till you got into trouble. And laws, laws, chile, dat's de way with us all. We never does call on de Father till we gets into trouble; and it takes heaps and heaps of trouble, sometimes to bring us round. Some time, chile, I'll tell you my 'sperence. I's got a 'sperence on this point. But, now, honey, don't trouble yourself no more; but just ask your Father to take care of your 'fairs, and turn over and go to sleep. And he'll do it. Now, you mind.'

So saying, Milly smoothed the pillow with anxious care, and, kissing Nina on the forehead, departed.

CHAPTER XIII.

TOM GORDON.

'I SAY, Nina,' said her brother, coming in the next day, from a survey that he had been taking round the premises, 'you want me here to manage this place. Everything going at sixes and sevens; and that nigger of a Harry riding round with his boots shining. That fellow cheats you, and feathers his own nest well, I know! These white niggers are all deceitful.'

'Come, Tom, you know the estate is managed just as father left word to have it; and uncle John says that Harry is an excellent manager. I'm sure nobody could have been more faithful to me; and I am very well satisfied.'

'Yes, I dare say. All left to you and the executors, as you call them; as if I were not the natural guardian of my sister! Then I come here to put up with that fellow's impudence!'

'Whose?—Harry's? He is never impudent. He is always gentlemanly. Everybody remarks it.'

'Gentlemanly! There it is, Nina! What a fool you are to encourage the use of that word in connection with any of your niggers! Gentleman, forsooth! And while he plays gentleman, who takes care? I tell you what, you'll find, one of these days, how things are going on. But that's just the way! You never would listen to me, or pay the least attention to my advice.'

'O, Tom, don't talk about that—don't! I never interfere about your affairs. Please leave me the right to manage mine in my own way.'

'And who is this Clayton that's hanging about here? are you going to have him, or he you, hey?'

'I don't know,' said Nina.

'Because I, for one, don't like him; and I shan't give my consent to let him have you. That other one is worth twice as much. He has one of the largest properties in New York. Joe Snider has told me about him. You shall have him.'

'I shall not have him, say what you please; and I shall have Mr. Clayton, if I choose,' said Nina, with a heightened colour. 'You have no right to dictate to me of my own affairs; and I shan't submit to it, I tell you frankly.'

'Highly-tighty! we are coming up to be sure!' said Tom.

'Moreover,' said Nina, 'I wish you to let everything on this place entirely alone; and remember that my servants are not your servants, and that you have no control over them whatever.'

'Well, we will see how you'll help yourself! I am never going skulking about on my father's own place, as if I hadn't right or title there; and if your niggers don't look sharp, they'll find out whether I am the master here or not, especially that Harry. If the dog dare so much as to lift his fingers to countermand any one of my orders, I'd put a bullet through his head as soon as I would through a buck's. I give you warning!'

'O, Tom, pray don't talk so!' said Nina, who really began to be alarmed. 'What do you want to make me such trouble for?'

The conversation was here suspended by the entrance of Milly.

'If you please, Miss Nina, to come and show me which of your muslins you wish done up, as I am starching for Miss Lee.'

Glad of an opportunity to turn the conversation, Nina flitted up to her room, whither she was followed by Milly, who shut the door, and spoke to her in mysterious tones.

'Miss Nina, can't you make some errand to get Harry off the place for two or three days, while master Tom's round?'

'But what right,' said Nina, with heightened colour, 'has he to dictate to my servants, or me? or to interfere with any of our arrangements here?'

'O, dere's no use talking about rights, honey. We must all do jost what we ken. Don't make much odds whether our rights is one way or t'other. You see, chile, it's just here; Harry's your right hand; but you see he an't learnt to bend 'fore the wind, like the rest of us. He is spirity; he is just as full now as a powder-box; and massa Tom is bent on aggravating him. And, laws, chile, dere may be bloody work—dere may so!'

'Why, do you think he'd dare—'

'Chile, don't talk to me! Dare! yes, sure enough he will dare! Besides, dere's fifty ways young gentlemen may take to aggravate and provoke. And when flesh and blood can't bear it no longer, if Harry raises his hand, why, den shoot him down! Nothing said—nothing done. You can't help yourself. You won't want to have a law-suit with your own brother; and, if you did, 'twouldn't bring Harry to life. Laws, chile, if I could tell you what I've seen!—you don't know nothing 'bout it. Now, I tell you, get up some message to your uncle's plantation; send him off for anything or nothing; only have him gone; and then speak your brother fair, and then may be he will go off. But don't you quarrel—don't you cross him, come what may. Dere an't a soul on the place that can bar de sight on him. But, then, you see the rest dey all bends! But, chile, you must be quick about it. Let me go right off and find him. Just you come in the little back-room, and I'll call him in.'

Pale and trembling, Nina descended into the room; and in a few moments after, Milly appeared, followed by Harry.

'Harry!' said Nina, in a trembling voice, 'I want you to take your horse and go over to uncle John's plantation, and carry a note for me.' Harry stood with his arms folded, and his eyes fixed upon the ground, and Nina continued—'And, Harry, I think you had better make some business or errand to keep you away two or three days, or a week.'

'Miss Nina,' said Harry, 'the affairs of the place are very pressing now, and need overlooking. A few days' neglect now may produce a great loss; and then it will be said that I neglected my business to idle and ride round the country.'

'Well, but if I send you, I take the responsibility, and I'll bear the loss. The fact is, Harry, I'm afraid that you won't have patience to be here, now Tom is at home. Indeed, Harry, I'm afraid for your life! And now, if you have any regard for me, make the best arrangement with the work you can, and be off. I'll tell him that I sent you on business of my own, and I'm going to write a letter for you to carry. It's the only safe way. He has so many ways in which he can provoke and insult you, that, at last you may say or do something that will give him occasion against you; and I think he is determined to drive you to this.'

'Isn't this provoking, now? isn't this outrageous?' said Harry, between his teeth, looking down, 'that everything must be left, and all because I haven't the right to stand up like a man, and protect you and yours?'

'It is a pity! it is a shame!' said Nina. 'But, Harry, don't stop to think upon it; do go.' She laid her hand softly on his. 'For my sake, now, be good—be good.'

The room where they were standing had long windows, which opened, like those of the parlor, on the veranda, and commanded a view of a gravel walk bordered with shrubbery. As Harry stood hesitating, he started at seeing Lisette come tripping up the walk, balancing on her head a basket of newly-ironed muslins and linens. Her trim little figure was displayed in a close-fitting gown of blue, a snowy handkerchief crossed upon her bust, and one rounded arm raised to steady the basket upon her head. She came tripping forward, with her usual airy motion, humming a portion of a song; and attracted, at the same moment, the attention of Tom Gordon and of her husband.

'Pon my word, if that isn't the prettiest concern!' said Tom, as he started up and ran down the walk to meet her. 'Good morning, my pretty girl,' he said.

'Good morning, sir,' returned Lisette, in her usual tone of gay cheerfulness.

'Pray, who do you belong to, my pretty little puss? I think I've never seen you on this place.'

'Please, sir, I'm Harry's wife.'

'Indeed! you are, hey? Devilish good taste he has!' said he, laying his hand familiarly on her shoulder. The shoulder was pulled away, and Lisette moved rapidly on to the other side of the path, with an air of vexation which made her look rather prettier. 'What, my dear, don't you know that I am your husband's young master? Come, come!' he said, following her, and endeavouring to take hold of her arm.

'Please let me alone!' said Lisette, colouring, and in a petted, vexed tone.

'Let you alone? No, that I shan't; not while you ask it in such a pretty way as that,' and again the hand was laid upon her shoulder.

It must be understood that Harry had witnessed so far in pantomime this scene. He had stood with compressed lips, and eyes slowly dilating, looking at it. Nina, who was standing with her back to the window, wondered at the expression of his countenance.

'Look there, Miss Nina!' he said. 'Do you see my wife and your brother?'

Nina turned, and in an instant the colour mounted to her cheeks; her little form seemed to dilate, and her eyes flashed fire; and before Harry could see what she was doing; she was down in the gravel-walk, and had taken Lisette's hand.

'Tom Gordon, she said, 'I'm ashamed of you! Hush! hush!' she continued, fixing her eyes on him, and stamping her foot. 'Dare to come to my place, and take such liberties here! You shall not be allowed to while I am mistress; and I am mistress! Dare to lay a finger on this girl while she is here under my protection! Come, Lisette!' and she seized the trembling girl by the hand, and drew her along towards the house. Tom Gordon was so utterly confused at this sudden burst of passion in his sister, that he let them go off without opposition. In a few moments he looked after her, and gave a long, low whistle.

'Ah! pretty well up for her! But she'll find it's easier said than done, I fancy!' And he sauntered up to the veranda, where Harry stood with his arms folded, and the veins in his forehead swelling with repressed emotion.

'Go in, Lisette,' said Nina; 'take the things into my room, and I'll come to you.'

'Pon my word, sir,' said Tom, coming up and addressing Harry in the most insulting tone, 'we are all under the greatest obligations to you for bringing such a pretty little fancy article here!'

'My wife does not belong to this place,' said Harry, forcing himself to speak calmly. 'She belongs to a Mrs. Le Clere, who has come into Belleville plantation.'

'Ah! thank you for the information! I may take a fancy to buy her, and I'd like to know who she belongs to. I've been wanting a pretty little concern of that sort. She's a good house-keeper, isn't she, Harry? Does up shirts well? What do you suppose she could be got for? I must go and see her mistress.'

During this cruel harangue, Harry's hands twitched and quivered, and he started every now and then, looking first at Nina, and then at his tormentor. He turned deadly pale; even his lips were of ashy whiteness, and with his arms still folded, and making no reply, he fixed his large blue eyes upon Tom, and, as it sometimes happened in moments of excitement and elevation, there appeared on the rigid lines of his face, at that moment, so strong a resemblance to Colonel Gordon that Nina noticed and was startled by it. Tom Gordon noticed it also. It added fuel to the bitterness of his wrath; and there glared from his eyes a malignancy of hatred that was perfectly appalling. The two brothers seemed like thunder-clouds opposing each other, and ready to dart lightning. Nina hastened to interfere.

'Hurry, hurry, Harry! I want that message carried. Do, pray, go directly!'

'Let me see,' said Tom, 'I must call Jim, and have my horse. Which is the way to that Belleville plantation? I think I'll ride over there.' And he turned and walked indolently down the steps.

'For shame, Tom! you won't, you can't. How can you want to trouble me so?' said Nina.

He turned and looked upon her with an evil smile, turned again, and was gone.

'Harry, Harry, go quick! Don't you worry, there's no danger!' she added, in a lower voice. 'Madame Le Clere never would consent.'

'There's no knowing,' said Harry, 'never any knowing. People act about money as they do about nothing else.'

'Then—then I'll send and buy her myself!' said Nina.

'You don't know how our affairs stand, Miss Nina,' said Harry, hurriedly. 'The money couldn't be raised now for it, especially if I have to go off this week. It will make a great difference, my being here or not being here; and very likely Master Tom may have a thousand dollars to pay down on the spot. I never knew him to want money when his will was up. Great God! haven't I borne this yoke long enough?'

'Well, Harry,' said Nina, 'I'll sell everything I've got—my jewels—everything! I'll mortgage the plantation before Tom Gordon shall do this thing! I'm not quite so selfish as I've always seemed to be. I know you've made the sacrifice of body and soul to my interest; and I've always taken it, because I loved my ease, and was a spoiled child. But, after all, I know I've as much energy as Tom has, when I'm roused, and I'll go over this very morning and make an offer for her. Only you be off. You can't stand such provocation as you get here; and if you yield, as any man will do, at last, then everything and everybody will go against you, and I can't protect you. Trust to me—I'm not so much of a child as I have seemed to be! You'll find I can act for myself, and you too. There comes Mr. Clayton through the shrubbery—that's right! Order two horses round to the door immediately, and we'll go over there this morning. Nina gave her orders with a dignity as if she had been a princess, and in all his agitation Harry could not help marvelling at the sudden air of womanliness which had come over her.

'I could serve you,' he said, in a low voice, 'to the last drop of my blood! But,' he added, in a tone which made Nina tremble, 'I hate everybody else! I hate your country! I hate your laws!'

'Harry,' said Nina, 'you do wrong—you forget yourself!'

'O, I do wrong, do I? We are the people that are never to do wrong! People may stick pins in us, stick knives in us, wipe their shoes on us, spit in our face—we must be amiable! we must be models of Christian patience! I tell you your father should rather have put me into quarters and made me work like a field negro than to have given me the education he did; and leave me under the foot of every white man that dares tread on me!'

Nina remembered to have seen her father in transports of passion, and was again shocked and startled to see the resemblance between his face and the convulsed face before her.

'Harry,' she said, in a pitying, half-admonitory tone, 'do think what you are saying! If you love me, be quiet!'

'Love you? you have always held my heart in your hand! That has been the clasp upon my chain. If it hadn't been for you, I should have fought my way to the north before now; or I would have found a grave on the road!'

'Well, Harry,' said Nina, after a moment's thought, 'my love shall not be a clasp upon any chain; for as there is a God in heaven, I will set you free! I'll have a bill introduced at the very next legislature, and I know what friend will see to it. So go now, Harry, go.'

Harry stood a minute, then suddenly raised the hand of his little mistress to his lips, turned, and was gone. Clayton, who had been passing through the shrubbery, and who had remarked that Nina was engaged in a very exciting conversation, had drawn off, and stood waiting for her at the foot of the verandah steps. As soon as Nina saw him, she reached out her hand frankly, saying—

‘Oh, there, Mr. Clayton, you are just the person. Wouldn’t you like to take a ride with me?’

‘Oh, of course I should,’ said he.

‘Wait here a moment,’ said she, ‘till I get ready. The horses will be here immediately.’ And running up the steps she passed quickly by him, and went into the house.

Clayton had felt himself in circumstances of considerable embarrassment ever since the arrival of Tom Gordon the evening before. He had perceived that the young man had conceived an instinctive dislike of himself, which he was at no particular pains to conceal; and he had found it difficult to preserve the appearance of one who does not notice. He did not wish to intrude upon Nina any embarrassing recognition of her situation, even under the guise of sympathy and assistance; and waited, therefore, till some word from her should authorize him to speak. He held himself, therefore, ready to meet any confidence which she might feel disposed to place in him; not doubting, from the frankness of her nature, that she would soon find it impossible not to speak of what was so deeply interesting to her.

Nina soon reappeared, and, mounting their horses, they found themselves riding through the same forest-road that led to the cottage of Tiff, from which a divergent path went to the Belleville plantation.

‘I’m glad to see you alone this morning for many reasons,’ said Nina, ‘for I think I never needed a friend’s help more. I’m mortified that you should have seen what you did last night; but, since you have, I may as well speak of it. The fact is, that my brother, though he is the only one I have, never did treat me as if he loved me. I can’t tell what the reason is: whether he was jealous of my poor father’s love for me, or whether it was that I was a wilful, spoiled girl, and so gave him reason to be set against me, or whatever the reason might be, he never has been kind to me long at a time. Perhaps he would be if I would always do exactly as he says; but I am made as positive and wilful as he is. I never have been controlled, and I can’t recognise the right which he seems to assume to control me, and to dictate as to my own private affairs. He was not left my guardian; and though I do love him, I shan't certainly take him as one. Now, you see, he has a bitter hatred, and a most unreasonable one, towards my Harry; and I had no idea, when I came home, in how many ways he had the power to annoy me. It does seem as if an evil spirit possessed them both when they get together; they seem as full of electricity as they can be, and I am every instant afraid of an explosion. Unfortunately for Harry, he has had a very superior education to the generality of his class and station, and the situation of trust in which he has been placed has given him more the feelings of a free man and a gentleman than is usual; for, except Tom, there isn't one of our family circle that hasn't always treated him with kindness, and even deference; and I think this very thing angers Tom the more, and makes him take every possible occasion of provoking and vexing. I believe it is his intention to push Harry up to some desperate action; and when I see how frightfully they look at each other, I tremble for the consequences. Harry has lately married a very pretty wife, with whom he lives in a little cottage on the extremity of the Belleville estate; and this morning Tom happened to spy her, and it seemed to inspire him with a most ingenious plan to trouble Harry. He threatened to come over and buy her of Madame Le Clere; and so, to quiet Harry, I promised to come over here before him, and make an offer for her.'

'Why,' said Clayton, 'do you think her mistress would sell her?'

'I can't say,' said Nina. 'She is a person I am acquainted with only by report. She is a New Orleans Creole, who has lately bought the place. Lisette, I believe, hires her time of her. Lisette is an ingenious, active creature, and contrives, by many little arts and accomplishments, to pay a handsome sum monthly to her mistress. Whether the offer of a large sum at once would tempt her to sell her, is more than I know until it's tried. I should like to have Lisette, for Harry's sake.'

'And do you suppose your brother was really serious?'

'I shouldn't be at all surprised if he were. But, serious or not serious, I intend to make the matter sure.'

'If it be necessary to make an immediate payment,' said Clayton, 'I have a sum of money which is lying idle in the bank, and it's but drawing a check, which will be honoured at sight.<sup>7</sup> I mention this, because the ability to make an im-payment may make the negotiation easier. You or allow me the pleasure of joining you in a good work.'

'Thank you,' said Nina, frankly. 'It may not be necessary; but if it should be, I will take it in the same spirit in which it is offered.'

After a ride of about an hour, they arrived in the boundaries of the Belleville plantation. In former days Nina had known this as the residence of an ancient rich family, with whom her father was on visiting terms. She was therefore uncomfortably struck with the air of poverty, waste, and decay, everywhere conspicuous through the grounds. Nothing is more depressing and disheartening than the sight of a gradual decay of what has been arranged and constructed with great care; and when Nina saw the dilapidated gateway, the crushed and broken shrubbery, the gaps in the fine avenue where trees had been improvidently cut down for fire-wood, she could not help a feeling of depression.

'How different this place used to be when I came here as a child!' said she. 'This Madame, whatever her name is, can't be much of a manager.' As she said this, their horses came up to the front of the house, in which the same marks of slovenly neglect were apparent. Blinds were hanging by one hinge; the door had sunk down into the rotten sill; the wooden pillars that supported it were decayed at the bottom; and the twining roses which once climbed upon them laid trailing, dishonoured, upon the ground. The veranda was littered with all kinds of rubbish—rough boxes, saddles, bridles, overcoats; and various nondescript articles formed convenient hiding-places and retreats, in which a troop of negro children, and three or four dogs, were playing at hide-and-go-seek with great relish and noise.

On the alighting of Nina and Clayton at the door, they all left their sports, and arranged themselves in a grinning row, to see the new-comers descend.

Nothing seemed to be further from the minds of the little troop than affording the slightest assistance in the way of holding horses or answering questions. All they did was alternately to look at each other and the travellers, and grin. A tattered servant-man, with half a straw hat on his head, was at length raised by a call of Clayton, who took their horses—having first distributed a salutation of kicks and cuffs among the children asking where their manners were that they didn't show the gentleman and lady in. And Nina and Clayton were now marshalled by the whole seven of them into an apartment on the right of the great hall. Everything in the room appeared in an unfinished state. The curtains were half put up at the windows, and part lying in a confused heap on the chairs. The damp, mouldy paper, which hung loosely from the wall, had been torn away in some places, as if to prepare for repapering; and certain half-opened rolls of costly wall paper lay on the table, on which appeared the fragments of some ancient luncheon; to wit, plates, and pieces of bread and cheese, dirty tumblers, and an empty bottle. It was difficult to find a chair sufficiently free from dust to sit down on. Nina sent up her card by one of the small fry, who, having got half way up the staircase, was suddenly taken with the desire to slide down the banisters with it in his hand. Of course he dropped the card in the operation, and the whole group precipitated themselves briskly on to it, all in a heap, and fought tooth and nail for the honour of carrying it up stairs. They were aroused, however, by the entrance of the man with half a hat, who, on Nina's earnest suggestion, plunged into the troop, which ran, chattering and screaming like so many crows, to different parts of the hall, while he picked up the card, and, with infinite goodwill beaming on his shining black face, went up with it, leaving Nina and Clayton waiting below. In a few moments he returned. 'Missis will see de young lady up stairs.'

Nina tripped promptly after him, and left Clayton the sole tenant of the parlor for an hour. At length she returned, skipping down the stairs with great animation. 'The thing is done!' she said. 'The bill of sale will be signed as soon as we can send it over.'

'I had better bring it over myself,' said Clayton, 'and make the arrangement.'

'So be it,' said Nina. 'But pray let us be delivered from this place. Did you ever see such a desolate-looking house? I remember when I've seen it a perfect Paradise, full of the most agreeable people.'

'And pray what sort of a person did you find?' said Clayton, as they were riding homeward.

'Well,' said Nina, 'she's one of the tow-string order of women, very slack twisted too, I fancy; tall, snuffy, and sallow; clothes looked rough-dry, as if they had been pulled out of a bag. She had a bright-colored Madras handkerchief tied round her head, and spoke French a little more through her nose than French people usually do. Flourished a yellow silk pocket-handkerchief.

Poor soul! she said she had been sick for a week with tooth-ache, and kept awake all night; so one mustn't be critical. One comfort about these French people is, that they are always ravis de vous voir, let what will turn up. The good soul was really polite, and insisted on clearing all the things off from a dusty old chair for me to sit down in. The room was as much at sixes and sevens as the rest of the house. She apologised for the whole state of things, by saying that they could not get workmen out there to do anything for her; and so everything is left in the second future tense, and the darkeys, I imagine, have a general glorification in the chaos. She is one of the indulgent sort, and I suspect she'll be eaten up by them like the locusts. Poor thing! she is shockingly home-sick, and longing for Louisiana again. For, notwithstanding her snuffy appearance and yellow pocket-hankerchief, she really has a genuine taste for beauty, and spoke most feelingly of the oleanders, crape myrtles, and cape jessamines of her native state.'

'Well, how did you introduce your business?' said Clayton, laughing at this description.

'Me? why I flourished out the little French I have at command, and she flourished her little English; and I think I rather prepossessed the good soul, to begin with. Then I made a sentimental story about Lisette and Harry's amours; because I know French people always have a taste for the sentimental. The old thing was really quite affected, wiped her little black eyes, pulled her hooked nose as a tribute to my eloquence, called Lisette her enfant mignon, and gave me a little lecture on the tender passion, which I am going to lay up for future use.'

'Indeed!' said Clayton; 'I should be charmed to have you repeat it. Can't you give us a synopsis?'

'I don't know what synopsis means; but if you want me to tell you what she said, I shan't do it. Well, now, do you know, I am in the best spirits in the world, now that I've got this thing off my mind, and out of that desolate house! Did you ever see such a direful place? What is the reason, when we get down south here, everything seems to be going to destruction so? I noticed it all the way down through Virginia. It seems as if everything had stopped growing, and was going backwards. Well, now, it's so different at the north. I went up, one vacation, into New Hampshire. It's a dreadfully poor barren country, nothing but stony hills and poor soil; and yet the people there seem to be so well off. They live in such nice, tight, clean-looking white houses! Everything around them looks so careful and comfortable; and yet their land is not half so good as ours down here. Why, actually, some of these places seem as if there were nothing but rock. And then they have winter about nine months in the year, I do believe. But these Yankees turn everything to account. If a man's field is covered with rock, he'll find some way to sell it and make money out of it; and if they freeze up all winter, they sell the ice, and make money out of that. They just live by selling their disadvantages!

'And we grow poor by wasting our advantages,' said Clayton.

'Do you know,' said Nina, 'people think it's a dreadful thing to be an abolitionist? But, for my part, I've a great inclination to be one. Perhaps because I have a contrary turn, and always have a little spite against what everybody else believes. But if you won't tell anybody, I'll tell you—I don't believe in slavery.'

'Nor I either,' said Clayton.

'You don't? Well, really, I thought I was saying something original. Now, the other day, aunt Nesbit's minister was at our house, and they sat crooning together, as they always do; and among other things, they said, "What a blessed institution it was to bring these poor Africans over here to get them Christianized!" So, by way of saying something to give them a start, I told them I thought they came nearer to make heathens of us than we to make Christians of them.'

'That's very true,' said Clayton. 'There's no doubt that the kind of society which is built up in this way constantly tends to run back towards barbarism. It prevents general education of the whites, and keeps the poorer classes down to the lowest point, while it enriches a few.'

'Well, what do we have it for?' said Nina. 'Why don't we blow it up, right off?'

'That's a question easier asked than answered. The laws against emancipation are very stringent. But I think it is every owner's business to contemplate this as a future resort, and to educate his servants in reference to it. That is what I am trying to do on my plantation.'

'Indeed,' said Nina, looking at him with a good deal of interest. 'Well, now, that reminds me of what I was going to say to you. Generally speaking, my conscience don't trouble me much about my servants, because I think they are doing about as well with me as they would be likely to do anywhere else. But, now, there's Harry; he is well educated, and I know that he could do for himself anywhere better than he does here. I have always had a kind of sense of this, but I've thought of it more lately, and I'm going to try to have him set free at the next legislature; and I shall want you to help me about all the what-do-you-call-'ems.'

'Of course I shall be quite at your service,' said Clayton.

'There used to be some people when I was up at the north, who talked as if all of us were no better than a parcel of robbers and thieves; and of course, when I was there, I was strong for our institutions, and would not give them an inch of ground. It set me to thinking though; and the result of my thinking is, that we have no right to hold those to work for us who clearly can do better. Now, there's aunt Nesbit's Milly, there's Harry and Lisette. Why, it's clear enough that if they can support themselves and us too, they certainly can support themselves alone. Lisette has paid eight dollars a month to her mistress, and supported herself besides. I'm sure it's we that are the helpless ones.'

'Well, do you think your aunt Nesbit is going to follow your example?'

'No; catch her at it! Aunt Nesbit is doubly fortified in her religion. She is so satisfied with something or other about "Cursed be Canaan," that she'd let Milly earn ten dollars a month for her all the year round, and never trouble her head about taking every bit of it. Some folks, you know, have a way of calling everything they want to do a dispensation of Providence! Now, aunt Nesbit is one of 'em. She always calls it a dispensation that the negroes were brought over here, and a dispensation that we are the mistresses. Ah! Milly will not get free while aunt Nesbit is alive! And do you know, though it does not seem very generous in me, yet I'm resigned to it, because Milly is such a good soul, and such a comfort to me? Do you know, she seems a great deal more like a mother to me than aunt Nesbit? Why, I really think, if Milly had been educated as we are, she would have made a most splendid woman—been a perfect Candace, Queen of Ethiopia. There's a vast deal that is curious and interesting in some of these old Africans. I always did love to be with them, some of them are so shrewd and original! But I wonder, now, what Tom will think of my cutting him out so neatly. 'Twill make him angry, I suppose.'

'Oh, perhaps, after all, he had no real intention of doing anything of the kind,' said Clayton. 'He may have said it merely for bravado.'

'I should have thought so if I hadn't known that he always had a grudge against Harry.'

At this moment the galloping of a horse was heard in the woodland path before them; and very soon Tom Gordon appeared in sight, accompanied by another man, on horseback, with whom he was in earnest conversation. There was something about the face of this man which, at the first glance, Nina felt to be very repulsive. He was low, thick set, and yet lean; his features were thin and sharp; his hair and eyebrows bushy and black, and a pair of glassy, pale-blue eyes, formed a peculiar contrast to their darkness. There was something in the expression of the eye which struck Nina as hard and cold. Though the man was habited externally as a gentleman, there was still about him an under-bred appearance which could be detected at the first glance, as the coarseness of some wood will reveal itself through every varnish.

'Good morning, Nina,' said her brother, drawing his horse up to meet hers, and signing to his companion to arrest his also. 'Allow me to present to you my friend Mr. Jekyl. We are going out to visit the Belleville plantation.'

'I wish you a pleasant ride,' said Nina. And touching her horse, she passed them in a moment. Looking back almost fiercely, a moment, she turned and said to Clayton,—

'I hate that man.'

'Who is it?' said Clayton.

'I don't know,' said Nina. 'I never saw him before. But I hate him. He is a bad man. I'd as soon have a serpent come near me as that man.'

'Well the poor fellow's face isn't prepossessing,' said Clayton. 'But I should not be prepared for such an anathema.'

'Tom's badness,' continued Nina, speaking as if she were following out a train of thought without regarding her companion's remark, 'is good turned to bad. It's wine turned to vinegar. But this man don't even know what good is.'

'How can you be so positive about a person that you have only seen once?' said Clayton.

'Oh,' said Nina, resuming her usual gay tones, 'don't you know that girls and dogs, and other inferior creatures, have the gift of seeing what's in people? It doesn't belong to highly-cultivated folks, like you; but to us poor creatures, who have to trust to our instincts. So, beware!' And, as she spoke, she turned to him with a fascinating air of half-saucy defiance.

'Well,' said Clayton, 'have you seen then what is in me?'

'Yes, to be sure,' said Nina, with energy; 'I knew what you were the very first time I saw you. And that's the reason why—'

Clayton made an eager gesture, and his eye met hers with a sudden flash of earnestness. She stopped, and blushed, and then laughed.

'What, Nina?'

'Oh, well, I always thought you were a grandfatherly body, and that you wouldn't take advantage of us girls, as some of the men do. And so I've treated you with confidence, as you know. I had just the same feeling that you could be trusted, as I have that that other fellow cannot.'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'that deduction suits me so well that I should be sorry to undermine your faith. Nevertheless, I must say such a way of judging isn't always safe. Instinct may be a greater matter than we think; yet it isn't infallible, any more than our senses. We try the testimony even of our eyesight by reason. It will deceive us if we don't. Much more we ought to try this more subtle kind of sight.'

'May be so,' said Nina; 'yet I don't think I shall like that man, after all. But I'll give him a chance to alter my feeling, by treating him civilly if Tom brings him back to dinner. That's the best I can do.'

CHAPTER XIV.

AUNT NESBIT'S LOSS.

ON entering the house, Nina was met at the door by Milly, with a countenance of some anxiety.

'Miss Nina,' she said, 'your aunt has heard bad news this morning.'

'Bad news!' said Nina, quickly. 'What?'

'Well, honey, ye see dere has been a lawyer here,' said Milly, following Nina as she was going up stairs, 'and she has been shut up with him all de mornin'; and when he come out I found her taking on quite dreadful. And she says she has lost all her property.'

'Oh! is that all?' said Nina. 'I didn't know what dreadful thing might have happened. Why, Milly, this isn't so very bad. She hadn't much to lose.'

'Oh, bless you, chile! nobody wants to lose all they got, much or little.'

'Yes, but,' said Nina, 'you know she can always live here with us; and what little money she wants to fuss with, to buy new caps, and paregoric for her cough, and all such little matters, we can give her easily enough.'

'Ah, Miss Nina, your heart is free enough; you'd give away both ends of the rainbow, if you had 'em to give. But the trouble is, chile, you haven't got 'em. Why, chile, dis yer great place, and so many mouths opened to eat and eat, chile, I tell you it takes heaps to keep it a-going. And Harry, I tell you, finds it hard work to bring it even all the year round, though he never says nothing to you about his troubles—wants you always to walk on flowers, with both hands full, and never think where they came from. I tell you what, chile, we's boun' to think for you a little; and I tell you what, I's jist a going to hire out.'

'Why, Milly, how ridiculous!'

'It ain't ridiculous, now. Why, just look on it, Miss Nina. Here's Miss Loo, dat's one; dere's me, dat's two; here's Polly—great grown girl—three; dere's Tomtit, four; all on us eating your bread, and not bringing in a cent to you, 'cause all on us together ain't done much more than wait on Miss Loo. Why, you's got servants enough of your own to do every turn that wants doing in dis yer house. I know, Miss Nina, young ladies don't like to hear about dese things; but the fac is, victuals cost something, and dere must be some on us to bring in something. Now, dat ar gentleman what talked with your aunt he said he could find me a right good place up dar to the town, and I was just a going. Sally, she is big enough now to do everything that I have been used to doing for Miss Loo, and I am just a going; besides, to tell you the truth, I think Miss Loo has kind o' set her heart upon it. You know she is a weakly kind of thing—don't know how to do much 'cept sit in her chair and groan. She has always been so used to having me make a way for her; and when I told her about dis yer she kind o' brightened up.'

'But, Milly, what shall I do? I can't spare you at all,' said Nina.

'Laws bless you, chile! don't you 'spose I's got eyes? I tell you, Miss Nina, I looked that gentleman over pretty well for you, and my opinion is, he'll do.'

'Oh, come, you hush!' said Nina,

'You see, chile, it wouldn't be everybody that our people would be willing to have come on to the place here; but there an't one of 'em that wouldn't go in for dis yer, now I tell you. Dere's Old Hundred, as you calls him, told me 'twas just as good as a meeting to hear him reading the prayers dat ar day at de funeral. Now, you see, I's seen gentlemen handsome and rich, and right pleasant, too, dat de people wouldn't want at all; 'cause why? dey has dere frolics and drinks, and de money flies one way for dis ting and one way for dat; till by and by it's all gone. Den comes de sheriff, and de people is all sold, some one way and some another way. Now, Mr. Clayton, he ain't none of dem.'

'But, Milly, all this may be very well; but if I couldn't love him?'

'Law sakes, Miss Nina! You look me in de face and tell me dat ar? Why, chile, it's plain enough to see through you. 'Tis so. De people's all pretty sure, by this time. Sakes alive, me's used to looking out for the weather; and me knows pretty well what's coming. And now, Miss Nina, you go right along, and give him a good word, 'cause you see, dear lamb, you need a good husband to take care of you—dat's what you want, chile. Girls like you has a hard life being at the head of a place, especially your brother being just what he is. Now, if you had a husband here, Mas'r Tom 'ud be quiet, 'cause he knows he couldn't do nothing. But just as long as you's alone, he'll plague you. But now, chile, it's time for you to be getting ready for dinner.'

'O, but, do you know, Milly,' said Nina, 'I've something to tell you, which I had liked to have forgotten! I have been out to the Belleville plantation, and bought Harry's wife.'

'You has, Miss Nina!' 'Why, de Lord bless you! Why, Harry was dreadful worked, dis here morning, 'bout what Mas'r Tom said. 'Peared like he was most crazy.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I've done it. I've got the receipt here.'

'Why, but chile, where alive did you get all the money to pay down right sudden so?'

'Mr. Clayton lent it to me,' said Nina.

'Mr. Clayton! now, chile, didn't I tell you so? Do you suppose, now, you'd a let him lend you dat ar money if you hadn't liked him. But, come, chile, hurry! Dere's Mas'r Tom and dat other gentleman coming back, and you must be down to dinner.'

The company assembled at the dinner-table was not particularly enlivening. Tom Gordon, who, in the course of his morning ride, had discovered the march which his sister had stolen upon him, was more sulky and irritable than usual, though too proud to make any allusion to the subject. Nina was annoyed by the presence of Mr. Jekyl, whom her brother insisted should remain to dinner. Aunt Nesbit was uncommonly doleful of course. Clayton, who in mixed society generally took part of a listener rather than a talker, said very little; and had it not been for Carson, there's no saying whether any of the company would have spoken. Every kind of creature has its uses, and there are times when a lively unthinking chatterbox is a perfect godsend. Those unperceiving people, who never notice the embarrassment of others, and who walk with the greatest facility into the gaps of conversation, simply because they have no perception of any difficulty,—these have their hour; and Nina felt positively grateful to Mr. Carson for the continuous and cheerful rattle which had so annoyed her the day before. Carson drove a brisk talk with the lawyer about the value of property, per centage, &c.; he sympathised with aunt Nesbit on her last-caught cold; rallied Tom on his preoccupation; complimented Nina on her improved color from her ride; and seemed on such excellent terms with himself and everybody else, that the thing was really infectious.

'What do you call your best investments down here,—land, eh?' he said to Mr. Jekyl.

Mr. Jekyl shook his head. 'Land deteriorates too fast. Besides, there's all the trouble and risk of overseers, and all that. I've looked this thing over pretty well, and I always invest in niggers.'

'Ah!' said Mr. Carson, 'you do?'

'Yes, sir, I invest in niggers; that's what I do; and I hire them out, sir—hire them out. Why, sir, if a man has a knowledge of human nature, knows where to buy, and when to buy, and watches his opportunity, he gets a better per centage on his money that way than any other. Now, that was what I was telling Mrs. Nesbit this morning. Say, now, that you give one thousand dollars for a man—and I always buy the best sort, that's economy; well, and he gets—put it at the lowest figure—ten dollars a month's wages, and his living, well, you see there, that gives you a pretty handsome sum for your money. I have a good talent for buying—I generally prefer mechanics. I have got now working for me three bricklayers, I own two first-rate carpenters, and last month I bought a perfect jewel of a blacksmith. He is an uncommonly ingenious man, a fellow that will make easy his fifteen dollars a month, and he is the more valuable because he has been religiously brought up. Why, some of them, now, will cheat you if they can; but this fellow has been brought up in a district where they have a missionary, and a great deal of pains has been taken to form his religious principles. Now, this fellow would no more think of touching a cent of his earnings than he would of stealing right out of my pocket. I tell people about him sometimes when I find them opposed to religious instruction. I tell them, "See there now—you see how godliness is profitable to the life that now is." You know the Scriptures, Mrs. Nesbit?"

'Yes,' said Mrs. Nesbit; 'I always believed in religious education?'

'Confound it all!' said Tom, 'I don't! I don't see the use of making a set of hypocritical sneaks of them. I'd make niggers bring me my money; but, hang it all, if he came snuffling to me, pretending 'twas his duty, I'd choke him! They never think so—they don't, and they can't—and it's all hypocrisy, this religious instruction, as you call it!'

'No, it isn't,' said the undiscouraged Mr. Jekyl; 'not when you found it on right principles. Take them early enough and work them right, you'll get it ground into them. Now, when they began religious instruction, there was a great prejudice against it in our part of the country. You see that they were afraid that the niggers would get uppish. Ah, but you see the missionaries are pretty careful; they put it in strong in the catechisms about the rights of the master. You see the instruction is just grounded on this, that the master stands in God's place to them.'

'D——d bosh!' said Tom Gordon.

Aunt Nesbit looked across the table as if she were going to faint. But Mr. Jekyl's composure was not in the slightest degree interrupted.

'I can tell you,' he said, 'that in a business, practical view, for I am used to investments—that since the publishing of these catechisms, and the missionaries' work among the niggers, the value of that kind of property has risen ten per cent. They are better contented. They don't run away, as they used to. Just that simple idea, that their master stands in God's place to them. Why, you see, it cuts its way.'

'I have a radical objection to all that kind of instruction,' said Clayton.

Aunt Nesbit opened her eyes, as if she could hardly believe her hearing.

'And pray, what is your objection?' said Mr. Jekyl, with an unmoved countenance.

'My objection is, that it's all a lie,' said Clayton, in such a positive tone that everybody looked at him with a start.

Clayton was one of those silent men who are seldom roused to talk, but who go with a rush when they are. Not seeming to notice the startled looks of the company, he went on: 'It's a worse lie, because it's told to bewilder a simple, ignorant, confiding creature. I never could conceive how a decent man could ever look another man in the face, and say such things. I remember reading in one of the missionary reports, that when this doctrine was first propounded in an assembly of negroes somewhere, all the most intelligent of them got up and walked deliberately out of the house; and I honour them for it.'

'Good for them!' said Tom Gordon. 'I can keep my niggers down without any such stuff as that.'

'I have no doubt,' said Clayton, 'that these missionaries are well-intending good men, and that they actually think the only way to get access to the negroes at all is to be very positive in what will please the masters. But I think they fall into the same error that the Jesuits did when they adulterated Christianity with idolatry, in order to get admission into Japan. A lie never works well in religion nor in morals.'

'That's what I believe,' said Nina, warmly.

'But then, if you can't teach them this, what can you teach them?' said Mr. Jekyl.

'Confound it all!' said Tom Gordon, 'teach them that you've got the power; teach them the weight of your fist! That's enough for them. I am bad enough, I know, but I can't bear hypocrisy. I show a fellow my pistol. I say to him, you see that, sir! I tell him, you do so and so, and you shall have a good time with me. But you do that, and I'll thrash you within an inch of your life! That's my short method with nigger and poor whites too. When one of these canting fellow comes round to my plantation, let him see what he'll get, that's all.'

Mr. Jekyl appeared properly shocked at this declaration. Aunt Nesbit looked as if it was just what she had expected, and went on eating her potatoe with a mournful air, as if nothing could surprise her. Nina looked excessively annoyed, and turned a sort of appealing glance upon Clayton.

'For my part,' said Clayton, 'I base my religious instructio to my people on the ground that every man and every woman must give an account of themselves to God alone; and that God is to be obeyed first, and before me.'

'Why,' said Mr. Jekyl, 'that would be destructive of all discipline. If you are going to allow every fellow to judge for himself, among a parcel of ignorant, selfish wretches, what the will of God is, one will think it's one thing, another will think it's another, and there will be an end of all order. 'Twould be absolutely impossible to govern a place in that way.'

'They must not be left an ignorant set,' said Clayton. 'They must be taught to read the Scriptures for themselves, and be able to see that my authority accords with it. If I command anything contrary to it, they ought to oppose it.'

'Ah! I should like to see a plantation managed in that way,' said Tom Gordon, scornfully.

'Please God you shall see such an one, if you'll come to mine,' said Clayton, 'where I should be very happy to see you, sir.'

The tone in which this was said was so frank and sincere, that Tom was silenced, and could not help a rather sullen acknowledgment.

'I think,' said Mr. Jekyl, 'that you'll find such a course, however well it may work at first, will fail at last. You begin to let people think, and they won't stop where you want them to; they'll go too far; it's human nature. The more you give, the more you may give. You once get your fellows to thinking and asking all sorts of questions, and they get discontented at once. I've seen that thing tried in one or two instances, and it didn't turn out well. Fellows got restless and discontented. The more was given to them the more dissatisfied they grew, till finally they put for the free states.'

'Very well,' said Clayton, 'if that's to be the result, they may all "put" as soon as they can get ready. If my title to them won't bear an intelligent investigation, I don't wish to keep them. But I never will consent to keep them by making false statements to them in the name of religion, and presuming to put myself as an object of obedience before my Maker.'

'I think,' said Mr. Carson, 'Mr. Clayton shows an excellent spirit—excellent spirit! On my word I think so! I wish some of our northern agitators, who make such a fuss on the subject, could hear him: I'm always disgusted with these abolitionists producing such an unpleasantness between the north and the south, interrupting trade and friendship, and all that sort of thing.'

'He shows an excellent spirit,' said Mr. Jekyl, 'but I must think he is mistaken if he thinks that he can bring up people in that way under our institutions, and not do them more harm than good. It's a notorious fact that the worst insurrections have arisen from the reading of the Bible by these ignorant fellows. That was the case with Nat Turner, in Virginia. That was the case with Denmark Vesey and his crew, in South Carolina. I tell you, sir, this will never do, this turning out a set of ignorant people to pasture in the Bible! That blessed book is a savor of life unto life when it's used right; but it's a savor of death unto death when ignorant people take hold of it. The proper way is this: administer such portions only as these creatures are capable of understanding. This admirable system of religious instruction keeps the matter in our own hands, by allowing us to select for them such portions of the word as are best fitted to keep them quiet, dutiful, and obedient; and I venture to predict that whoever undertakes to manage a plantation on any other system will soon find it getting out of his hands.'

'So you are afraid to trust the Lord's words without holding the bridle,' said Tom, with a sneer. 'That's pretty well for you.'

'I am not,' said Clayton; 'I'm willing to resign any rights to any one that I am not able to defend in God's word—any that I cannot make apparent to any man's cultivated reason. I scorn the idea that I must dwarf a man's mind, and keep him ignorant and childish in order to make him believe any lie I choose to tell him about my rights over him! I intend to have an educated, intelligent people, who shall submit to me because they think it clearly for their best interests to do so; because they shall feel that what I command is right in the sight of God.'

'It's my opinion,' said Tom, 'that both these ways of managing are humbugs. One way makes hypocrites, and the other makes rebels. The best way of educating is to show folks that they can't help themselves. All the fussing and arguing in the world isn't worth one dose of certainty on that point. Just let them know that there are no two ways about it, and you'll have all still enough.'

From this point the conversation was pursued with considerable warmth, till Nina and aunt Nesbit rose and retired to the drawing-room. Perhaps it did not materially discourage Clayton in the position he had taken, that Nina, with the frankness usual to her, expressed the most eager and undisguised admiration of all that he said.

'Didn't he talk beautifully? Wasn't it noble?' she said to aunt Nesbit, as she came into the drawing-room. 'And that hateful Jekyl! isn't he mean?'

'Child!' said aunt Nesbit, 'I'm surprised to hear you speak so! Mr. Jekyl is a very respectable lawyer, an elder in the church, and a very pious man. He has given me some most excellent advice about my affairs; and he's going to take Milly with him and find her a good place. He's been making some investigations, Nina, and he's going to talk to you about them after dinner. He's discovered that there's an estate in Mississippi, worth a hundred thousand dollars, that ought properly to come to you.'

'I don't believe a word of it!' said Nina. 'Don't like the man! think he is hateful! don't want to hear anything he has to say! don't believe in him!'

'Nina! how often I have warned you against such sudden prejudices—against such a good man, too!'

'You won't make me believe he is good, not if he were elder in twenty churches!'

'Well, but, child, at any rate you must listen to what he has got to say. Your brother will be very angry if you don't; and it's really very important. At any rate, you ought not to offend Tom, when you can help it.'

'That's true enough,' said Nina; 'and I'll hear, and try and behave as well as I can. I hope the man will go some time or other! I don't know why, but his talk makes me feel worse than Tom's swearing! That's certain.'

Aunt Nesbit looked at Nina as if she considered her in a most hopeless condition.

CHAPTER XV.

MR. JEKYL'S OPINIONS.

AFTER the return of the gentlemen to the drawing-room, Nina, at the request of Tom, followed him and Mr. Jekyl into the library.

'Mr. Jekyl is going to make some statements to us, Nina, about our property in Mississippi, which, if they turn out as he expects, will set us up in the world,' said Tom.

Nina threw herself carelessly into the leathern arm-chair by the window, and looked out of it.

'You see,' said Mr. Jekyl, also seating himself, and pulling out the stiff points of his collar, 'having done law business for your father, and known, in that way, a good deal about the family property, I have naturally always felt a good deal of interest in it; and you remember your father's sister, Mrs. Stewart, inherited, on the death of her husband, a fine estate in Mississippi.'

'I remember,' said Tom; 'well, go on.'

'Well, she died, and left it all to her son. Well, he, it seems, like some other young men, lived in a very reprehensible union with a handsome quadroon girl, who was his mother's maid; and she, being an artful creature, I suppose, as a great many of them are, got such an ascendancy over him, that he took her up to Ohio, and married her, and lived there with her some years, and had two children by her. Well, you see, he had a deed of emancipation recorded for her in Mississippi, and just taking her into Ohio set her free by the laws of that state. Well, you see, he thought he'd fixed it so that the thing couldn't be undone, and she thought so too; and I understand she's a pretty shrewd woman—has a considerable share of character, or else she would not have done just what she has; for you see he died about six months ago, and left the plantation and all the property to her and her children, and she has been so secure that she has actually gone and taken possession. You see, she is so near white, you must know that there isn't one in twenty would think what she was—and the people round there, actually, some of them, had forgotten all about it, and didn't know but what she was a white woman from Ohio: and so, you see, the thing never would have been looked into at all, if I hadn't happened to have been down here. But, you see, she turned off an overseer that had managed the place, because the people complained of him; and I happened to fall in with the man, and he began telling me his story, and, after a little inquiry, I found who these people were. Well, sir, I just went to one of the first lawyers, for I suspected there was false play; and we looked over the emancipation laws together, and we found out that as the law stood, the deed of emancipation was no more than a much waste-paper. And so, you see, she and her children are just as much slaves as any on her plantation ; and the whole property, which is worth a hundred thousand dollars, belongs to your family. I rode out with him and looked over the place, and got introduced to her and her children, and looked them over. Considered as property I should call them a valuable lot. She is past forty, but she don't look older than twenty-seven or twenty-eight, I should say. She is a very good-looking woman, and then, I'm told, a very capable woman. Well, her price in the market might range between one thousand and fifteen hundred dollars. Smalley said he had seen no better article sold for two thousand dollars ; but then, he said, they had to give a false certificate as to the age, and that I couldn't hear of, for I never countenance anything like untruth. Then, the woman's children ; she has got two fine-looking children as ever I have seen, almost white. The boy is about ten years old ; the little girl, about four. You may be sure I was pretty careful not to let on, because I consider the woman and her children are an important part of the property, and, of course, nothing had better be said about it, lest she should be off before we are ready to come down on them. Now, you see, you Gordons are the proper owners of this whole property ; there isn't the slightest doubt in my mind that you ought to put in your claim immediately. The act of emancipation was contrary to law, and, though the man meant well, yet it amounted to a robbery of the heirs. I declare it rather raised my indignation to see that creature so easy in the possession of property which of right belongs to you. Now, if I have only the consent of the heirs, I can go on and commence operations immediately.'

Nina had been sitting regarding Mr. Jekyl with a fixed and determined expression of countenance. When he had finished, she said to him—

'Mr. Jekyl, I understand you are an elder in the church ; is that true ?'

'Yes, Miss Gordon, I have that privilege,' said Mr. Jekyl, his sharp, business tone subsiding into a sigh.

'Because,' said Nina, 'I am a wild young girl, and don't profess to know much about religion ; but I want you to tell me, as a Christian, if you think it would be right to take this woman and children, and her property ?'

'Why, certainly, my dear Miss Gordon ; isn't it right that every one should have his own property ? I view things simply with the eye of the law, and in the eye of the law, that woman and her children are as much your property as the shoe on your foot; there is no manner of doubt of it.'

'I should think,' said Nina, 'that you might see with the eye of the Gospel sometimes. Do you think, Mr. Jekyl, that doing this is doing as I should wish to be done by, if I were in the place of this woman?'

'My dear Miss Gordon, young ladies of fine feeling, at your time of life, are often confused on this subject by a wrong application of the Scripture language. Suppose I were a robber, and had possession of your property? Of course I shouldn't wish to be made to give it up. But would it follow that the golden rule obliged the lawful possessor not to take it from me? This woman is your property, this estate is your property, and she is holding it as unlawfully as a robber. Of course she won't want to give it up; but right is right, notwithstanding.'

Like many other young persons, Nina could feel her way out of a sophistry much sooner than she could think it out; and she answered to all this reasoning—

'After all, I can't think it would be right.'

'O, confound the humbug!' said Tom, 'who cares whether it is right or not? The fact is, Nin, to speak plain sense to you, you and I both are deuced hard up for money, and want all we can get; and what's the use of being more religious than the very scoundrels themselves at our time of day? Mr. Jekyl is a pious man—one of the tallest kind! He thinks this is all right, and why need we set ourselves all up? He has talked with uncle John, and he goes in for it. As for my part, I am free to own I don't care whether it's right or not! I'll do it if I can. Might makes right—that's my doctrine.'

'Why,' said Mr. Jekyl, 'I have examined the subject, and I haven't the slightest doubt that slavery is a divinely-appointed institution, and that the rights of the masters are sanctioned by God; so, however much I may naturally feel for this woman, whose position is, I must say, an unfortunate one, still it is my duty to see that the law is properly administered in the case.'

'All I have to say, Mr. Jekyl,' said Nina, 'is just this: that I won't have anything to do with this matter; for if I can't prove it's wrong, I shall always feel it is.'

'Nina, how ridiculous!' said Tom.

'I have said my say,' said Nina, as she rose and left the room.

'Very natural—fine feelings, but uninstructed,' said Mr. Jekyl.

'Certainly, we pious folk know a trick worth two of that, don't we?" said Tom. "I say, Jekyl, this sister of mine is a pretty rapid little case, I can tell you, as you saw by the way she circumvented us this morning. She is quite capable of upsetting the whole dish, unless we go about it immediately. You see, her pet nigger, this Harry, is this woman's brother, and if she gave him the word, he'd write at once and put her on the alarm. You and I had better start off to-morrow, before this Harry comes back. I believe he is to be gone a few days. It's no matter whether she consents to the suit or not. She don't need to know anything about it."

"Well," said Jekyl, "I advise you to go right on, and have the woman and children secured. It's a perfectly fair, legal proceeding. There has been an evident evasion of the law of the state, by means of which your family are defrauded of an immense sum. At all events, it will be tried in an open court of justice, and she will be allowed to appear by her counsel. It's a perfectly plain, above-board proceeding; and, as the young lady has shown such fine feelings, there's the best reason to suppose that the fate of this woman would be as good in her hands as in her own."

Mr. Jekyl was not now talking to convince Tom Gordon, but himself; for, spite of himself, Nina's questions had awakened in his mind a sufficient degree of misgiving to make it necessary for him to pass in review the arguments by which he generally satisfied himself. Mr. Jekyl was a theologian, and a man of principle. His metaphysical talent indeed made him a point of reference among his Christian brethren; and he spent much of his leisure time in reading theological treatises. His favourite subject of all was the nature of true virtue; and this he had fixed in his mind, consisted in a love of the greatest good. According to his theology, right consisted in creating the greatest amount of happiness; and every creature had rights to be happy in proportion to his capacity of enjoyment or being. He whose capacity was ten pounds had a right to place his own happiness before that of him who had five, because, in that way, five pounds more of happiness would exist in the general whole. He considered the right of the Creator to consist in the fact that he had a greater amount of capacity than all creatures put together, and, therefore, was bound to promote his own happiness before all of them put together. He believed that the Creator made himself his first object in all that he did; and descending from him all creatures were to follow the same rule, in proportion to their amount of being; the greater capacity of happiness always taking precedence of the less. Thus Mr. Jekyl considered that the Creator brought into the world yearly myriads of human beings with no other intention than to make them everlastingly miserable; and that this was right because his capacity of enjoyment being greater than all theirs put together, he had a right to gratify himself in this way. Mr. Jekyl's belief in slavery was founded on his theology. He assumed that the white race had the largest amount of being, therefore it had a right to take precedence of the black. On this point he held long and severe arguments with his partner Mr. Israel McFogg, who, belonging to a different school of theology, referred the whole matter to no natural fitness, but to a divine decree, by which it pleased the Creator in the time of Noah to pronounce a curse upon Canaan. The fact that the African race did not descend from Canaan was, it is true, a slight difficulty in the chain of the argument; but theologians are daily in the habit of surmounting much greater ones. Either way, whether by metaphysical fitness or Divine decree, the two partners attained the same practical result. Mr. Jekyl, though a coarse-grained man, had started from the hands of nature no more hard-hearted or unfeeling than many others; but his mind, having for years been immersed in the waters of law and theology, had slowly petrified into such a steady consideration of the greatest general good, that he was wholly inaccessible to any emotion of particular humanity. The trembling eager tone of pity, in which Nina had spoken of the woman and children who were about to be made victims of a legal process, had excited but a moment's pause. What considerations of temporal loss and misery can shake the constancy of the theologian who has accustomed himself to contemplate and discuss, as a cool intellectual exercise, the eternal misery of generations? who worships a God that creates myriads only to afflict himself in their eternal torments?

CHAPTER XVI.

MILLY'S STORY.

NINA spent the evening in the drawing-room; and her brother, in the animation of a new pursuit, forgetful of the difference of the morning, exerted himself to be agreeable, and treated her with more consideration and kindness than he had done any time since his arrival. He even made some off-hand advances towards Clayton, which the latter received with good-humour, and which went further than she supposed to raise the spirits of Nina; and so, on the whole, she passed a more than usually agreeable evening. On retiring to her room, she found Milly, who had been for some time patiently waiting for her, having despatched her mistress to bed some time since.

'Well, Miss Nina, I am going on my travels in the morning. Thought I must have a little time to see you, lamb, 'fore I goes.'

'I can't bear to have you go, Milly. I don't like that man you are going with.'

'I 'spects he's a nice man,' said Milly. 'Of course he'll look me out a nice place, because he has always took good care of Miss Loo's affairs; so you never trouble yourself 'bout me! I tell you, chile, I never gets where I can't find de Lord; and when I finds him I gets along. De Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want.'

'But you have never been used to living except in our family,' said Nina, 'and, somehow, I feel afraid. If they don't treat you well, come back, Milly, will you?'

'Laws, chile, I isn't much feared but what I'll get along well enough. When people keep about dere business, doing the best dey ken, folks doesn't often trouble dem. I never yet seed de folks I couldn't suit,' she added, with a glow of honest pride. 'No, chile, it isn't for myself I's fearing; it's just for you, chile. Chile, you don't know what it is to live in dis yer world, and I wants you to get de Best Friend to go with you. Why, dear lamb, you wants somebody to go to and open your heart; somebody dat'll love you, and always stand by you; somebody dat'll always lead you right, you know. You has more cares than such a young thing ought for to have; great many looking to you, and 'pending on you. Now, if your ma was alive, it would be different; but just now I see how't is, dere'll be a hundred things you'll be thinking and feeling, and nobody to say 'em to. And now, chile, you must learn to go to de Lord. Why, chile, he loves you. Chile, he loves you just as you be. If you only saw how much, it would melt your heart right down. I told you I was going some time for to tell you my 'sperience—how I first found Jesus. Oh, Lord, Lord! but it is a long story.'

Nina, whose quick sympathies were touched by the earnestness of her old friend, and still more aroused by the allusion to her mother, answered, 'Oh, yes, come tell me about it! And drawing a low ottoman, she sat down, and laid her head on the lap of her humble friend.

'Well, well, you see, chile,' said Milly, her large dark eyes fixing themselves on vacancy, and speaking in a slow and dreamy voice, 'a body's life, in dis yer world, is a mighty strange thing. You see, chile, my mother—well, dey brought her from Africa; my father, too. Heaps and heaps my mother has told me about dat ar. Dat ar was a mighty fine country, where dey had gold in the rivers, and such great, big, tall trees, with de strangest beautiful flowers on them you ever did see. Laws, laws! Well, dey brought my mother and my father into Charleston, and dere Mr. Campbell—dat was your ma's father, honey—he bought them right out of de ship; but dey had five chil'en, and dey was all sold, and dey never knowed where they went to. Father and mother couldn't speak a word of English when dey come ashore; and she told me often how she couldn't speak a word to nobody to tell 'em how it hurt her. Laws, when I was a chile, I remember how often, when de day's work was done, she used to come out and sit and look up at de stars, and groan, groan, and groan. I was a little thing, playing round; and I used to come up to her, dancing and saying, "Mammy, what makes you groan so? what's de matter of you?" "Matter enough, chile," she used to say. "It's a thinking of my poor chil'en. I likes to look at the stars, because dey sees the same stars dat I do. 'Pears like we was in one room; but I don't know where dey is. Dey don't know where I be." Den she'd say to me, "Now, chile, you may be sold away from your mammy. Dere's no knowing what may happen to you, chile; but if you gets into any trouble, as I does, you mind, chile, you ask God to help you." "Who is God, mammy?" says I, any how. "Why, chile," says she, "he made dese yer stars." And den I wanted mammy to tell me more about it; only she says, "He can do anything he likes; and, if ye are in any kind of trouble, he can help you." Well, to be sure, I didn't mind much about it—~~all~~ dancing round, because pretty well don't need much help. But she said dat ar to me so many times, I couldn't help 'member it. "Chile, troubles will come; and when dey does come, you ask God, and he will help you."

'Well, sure enough I wasn't sold from her, but she was took from me, because Mr. Campbell's brother went off to live in Orleans, and parted de hands. My father and mother was took to Orleans, and I was took to Virginny. Well, you see, I growed up along with de young ladies—your ma, Miss Harrit, Miss Loo, and de rest on 'em—and I had heaps of fun. Dey all like Milly. Dey couldn't nobody run, nor jump, nor ride a horse; nor row a boat, like Milly; and so it was Milly here, and Milly dere, and whatever de young ladies wanted it was Milly made de way for it. Well, dere was a great difference among dem young ladies. Dere was Miss Loo—she was de prettiest, and she had a great many beaux; but den dere was your ma—everybody loved her; and den dere was Miss Harrit—she had right smart of life in her, and was always for doing something—always right busy 'tending to something or other, and she liked me because I'd always go in with her. Well, well, dem dar was pleasant times enough; but when I got to be about fourteen or fifteen, I began to feel kind o' bad—sort of strange and heavy. I really didn't know why, but 'peared likes when I got older I felt I was in bondage. 'Member one day your ma came in, and see'd me looking out of window, and she says to me, "Milly, what makes you so dull lately?" "Oh," says I, "I, somehow, don't have good times." "Why?" says she, "why not? Don't everybody make much of you, and don't you have everything that you want?" "Oh, well," says I, "missis, I's a poor slave-girl for all dat." Chile, your ma was a weety thing like you. I 'member just how she looked dat minute. I felt sorry, 'cause I thought I'd hurt her feelings. But, says she, "Milly, I don't wonder you feel so. I know I should feel so myself if I was in your place." Afterwards she told Miss Loo and Miss Harrit; but dey laughed, and said dey guessed der wasn't many girls who were as well off as Milly.

'Well, den, Miss Harrit she was married de first. She married Mr. Charles Blair; and when she was married, nothing was to do but she must have me to go with her. I liked Miss Harrit; but den, honey, I'd liked it much better if it had been your ma. I'd always counted that I wanted to belong to your ma, and I think your ma wanted me; but den she was still, and Miss Harrit she was one of the sort dat never lost nothing by not asking for it. She was one of de sort dat always got things, by hook or by crook. She always had more clothes, and more money, and more everything, dan de rest of dem, 'cause she was always wide awake, and looking out for herself. Well, Mr. Blair's place was away off in another part of Virginny, and I went dere with her. Well, she wan't very happy, no ways she wan't, because Mr. Blair he was a high fellow. Lawd, Miss Nina, when I tells you dis yere one you've got here is a good one, and I 'vise you to take him; it's because I knows what comes o' girls marrying high fellows. Don't care how good-looking dey is, nor what dere manners is, it's just de ruin of girls that has them. Laws, when he was a courting Miss Harrit, it was all nobody but her. She was going to be his angel, and he was going to give up all sorts of bad ways, and live such a good life. Ah! she married him. It all went to smoke. 'Fore the month was well over, he got a going in his old ways, and den it was go, go, all de time carousing and drinking—parties at home, parties abroad—money flying like de water.

' Well, dis made a great change in Miss Harrit. She didn't laugh no more; she got sharp and cross, and she wan't good to me like what she used to be. She took to be jealous of me and her husband. She might have saved herself de trouble. I shouldn't have touched him with a pair of tongs. But he was always running after everything that came in his ways; so no wonder. But 'twcen them both, I lived a bad life of it. Well, things dragged kind along in this way. She had three chil'en, and, at last, he was killed, one day, falling off his horse when he was too drunk to hold the bridle. Good riddance, too, I thought. And den, after he's dead, Miss Harrit, she seemed to grow more quiet like, and setting herself, picking up what pieces and crumbs was left for her, and de chil'en. And I member she had one of her uncles dere a good many days, helping her in counting up de debts. Well, dey was talking one day in missis's room, and dere was a little light closet in one side where I got set down to do some fine stitching; but dey was too busy in their 'counts to think anything 'bout me. It seemed dat de place and de people was all to be sold off to pay de debts—all 'cept a few of us, who were to go off with missis, and begin again on a small place—and I heard him telling her about it. "While your children are small," he says, "you can live small, and keep things close, and raise enough on the place for ye all; and den you can be making the most of your property. Niggers is rising in de market. Since Missouri came in, they's worth double, and so you can just sell de increase of 'em for a good sum. Now, there's that black girl, Milly, of yourn!"—you may be sure, now, I pricked up my ears, Miss Nina—"you don't often see a girl of finer breed than she is!" says he, just as if I'd been a cow, you know. "Have you got her a husband?" "No," said Miss Harrit; and, then, says she, "I believe Milly is something of a coquette among the young men. She's never settled on anybody yet," says she. "Well," says he, "that must be attended to, 'cause that girl's chil'en will be an estate of themselves. Why, I've known women to have twenty, and her chil'en wouldn't any of 'em be worth less than eight hundred dollars. There's a fortune at once. If deys like her, dey'll be as good as cash in the market. Any day you can send out and sell one, if you happen to be in any straits, just as soon as you can draw a note on the bank." O, laws, Miss Nina, I tell you dis yer fell on me like so much lead. 'Cause, you see, I'd been keeping company with a very nice young man, and I was going to ask Miss Harrit about it dat very day; but dere—I laid down my work dat minute, and thinks, says I, true as the Lord's in heaven, I won't never be married in dis world! And I cried about it off and on, all day, and at night I told Paul 'bout it. He was de one, you know. But Paul, he tried to make it all smooth. He guessed it wouldn't happen; he guessed missis would think better ou't. At any rate, we loved each other, and why shouldn't we take as much comfort as we could? Well, I went to Miss Harrit, and told her just what I thought, 'bout it. Allers had spoke my mind to Miss Harrit 'bout everything, and I wan't going to stop den. And she laughed at me, and told me not to cry 'fore I's hurt. Well things went on so two or three weeks, and finally Paul, he persuaded me. And so we was married. When our first chile was born, Paul was so pleased, he thought strange that I wan't. "Paul," said I, "dis yer chile arn't ourn; it may be took from us, and sold any day!" "Well, well," says he, "Milly, it may be God's chile, anyway, if it an't ourn!" 'Cause, you see, Miss Nina, Paul, he was a Christian. Ah, well, honey, I can't tell you; after dat I had a great many chil'en, girls and boys, growing up round me. Well, I's had fourteen chil'en, dear, and dey's all been sold from me, every single one of 'em. Lord, it's a heavy cross! heavy, heavy! None knows but dem dat bears it!

'What a shame!' said Nina. 'How could aunt Harriet be such a wicked woman? An aunt of mine do so!'

'Chile, chile,' said Milly, 'we doesn't none of us know what's in us. When Miss Harrit and I was gals together, hunting hens' eggs and rowing de boat in de river,—well, I wouldn't have thought it would have been so, and she wouldn't have thought so neither. But, den, what-little's bad in gals when dey's young and handsome, and all de world smiling on 'em—O, honey, it gets drefful strong when dey gets grown women, and de wrinkles comes in der faces! Always, when she was a gal—whether it was eggs, or berries, or chincapins, or what—it was Miss Harrit's nature to get and to keep; and when she got old, dat all turned to money.'

'O! but,' said Nina, 'it does seem impossible that a woman, a lady born, too, and my aunt, could do such a thing!'

'Ah, ah, honey! ladies-born have some bad stuff in dem, sometimes, like de rest of us. But, den, honey, it was de most natural thing in de world, come to look on't; for now, see here, honey. Dere was your aunt—she was poor, and she was pestered for money. Dere was Mas'r George's bills and Peter's bills to pay, and Miss Susy's, and every one of 'em must have everything; and dey was all calling for money, money! and dere has been times she didn't know which way to turn. Now, you see, when a woman is pestered to pay two hundred here and tree hundred dere, and when she has got more niggers on her place dan she can keep, and den a man calls in, and lays down eight hundred dollars in gold and bills before her, and says "I want dat ar Lucy or George of yourn," why, don't you see? Dese yer soul-drivers is always round tempting folks dey knows is poor; and dey always have der money as handy as de devil has his. But, den, I oughtn't fur to be hard upon dem poor soul-drivers, neither, 'cause they an't taught no better. It's dese yer Christians dat profess Christ, dat makes great talks 'bout religion, dat has der Bibles, and turns der backs upon swearing soul-drivers, and tinks dey ain't fit to speak to—it's dem, honey, dat's de root of de whole business. Now, dere was that uncle of hern—mighty great Christian he was, with his prayer-meetings, and all dat!—he was always putting her up to it. O, dere's been times—dere was times 'long first, Miss Nina, when my first chil'en was sold—dat, I tell you, I poured out my soul to Miss Harrit, and I've seen dat ar woman cry so dat I was sorry for her. And she said to me, "Milly, I'll never do it again." But, Lord! I didn't trust her, not a word on't; 'cause I knowed she would. I knowed dere was dat in her heart dat de devil wouldn't let her go. I knowed he'd no kind of objection to her 'musing herself with meetins, and prayers, and all dat; but he'd no notion to let go his grip on her heart. Bút, Lord! she wasn't quite a bad woman—poor Miss Harrit wasn't—and she wouldn't have done so bad, if it hadn't been for him. But he'd come and have prayers, and exhort, and den come prowling round my place like a wolf, looking at my chil'en. "And, Milly," he'd say, "how do you do now? Lucy is getting to be a right smart girl, Milly. How old is she? Dere's a lady in Washington has advertised for a maid—a nice woman, a pious lady. I suppose you wouldn't object, Milly. Your poor mistress is in great trouble for money!"

'I never said nothing to that man. Only once, when he asked me what he thought my Lucy would be worth, when she was fifteen years old, says I to him: "Sir, she is worth to me just what your daughter is worth to you." Den I went in and shut de door. I didn't stay to see how he took it. Den he'd go up to de house, and talk to Miss Harrit. 'Twas her duty, he'd tell her, to take proper care of her goods, and dat ar meant selling my chil'en. I 'member, when Miss Susy came home from boarding-school, she was a pretty girl, but I did not look on her very kind, I tell you, 'cause three of my chil'en had been sold to keep her at school. My Lucy—ah, honey!—she went for a lady's maid. I knowed what dat ar meant well enough. De lady had a son grown, and he took Lucy with him to Orleans, and dere was an end of dat. Dere don't no letters go 'tween us. Once gone, we can't write, and it is as good as being dead. Ah, no, chile, not so good. Paul used to teach Lucy little hymns nights 'fore she went to sleep; and if she'd a died right off after one of dem, it would have been better for her. Oh, honey! 'long dem times I used to rave and toss like a bull in a net—I did so. Well, honey, I wasn't what I was. I got cross and ugly. Miss Harrit, she grew a great Christian, and joined the church, and used to have heaps of ministers and elders at her house, and some on em used to try and talk to me. I told em I'd seen enough of der old religion, and I didn't want to hear no more. But Paul, he was a Christian; and when he talked to me I was quiet like, though I couldn't be like what he was.

'Well, last my missis promised me one. She'd give me my youngest child, sure and certain. His name was Alfred. Well, dat boy—I loved dat child better dan any of de rest of 'em. He was all I'd got left to love; for when he was a year old, Paul's master moved away down to Louisiana, and took him off, and I never heard no more of him. So it 'peared as if dis yer child was all I had left. Well he was a bright boy. O, he was most uncommon. He was so handy to anything, and saved me so many steps. O, honey! he had such ways with him—dat boy!—would always make me laugh. He took after larnin' mighty, and he larned himself to read, and he'd read de Bible to me sometimes. I just brought him up and taught him de best riled, and den dey whips 'em to break 'em in. So Stiles, when he was laying off Alfred's task, was real aggravating to him; and dat boy—well, he answered back, just as he allers would be doing, 'cause he was smart, and it 'peared like he couldn't keep it in. And den dey all laughed round dere, and den Stiles was mad, and swore he'd whip him; and den Alfred he cut and run. And den Stiles he swore awful at him, and he told him to "come here, and he'd give him hell, and pay him de cash." Dem is de very words he said to my boy. And Alfred said he wouldn't come back; he wasn't going to be whipped. And just den young Master Bill come along, and wanted to know what was de matter. So Stiles told him, and he took out his pistol, and said, "Here, young dog, if you don't come back before I count five, I'll fire." "Fire ahead!"* says Alfred; 'cause you see dat boy never knowed what fear was. And so he fired. And Huldah said he just jumped up and gave one scream, and fell flat. And dey run up to him, and he was dead; 'cause, you see, de bullet went right through his heart. Well, dey took off his jacket and looked, but it wan't of no use; his face settled down still. And Huldah said dat dey just dug a hole and put him in. Nothing on him, nothing round him, no coffin, like he'd been a dog. Huldah showed me de jacket. Dere was de hole, cut right round in it, like it was stamped, and his blood running out on it. I didn't say a word. I took up de jacket and wrapped it up with his Sunday clothes, and I walked straight—straight home. I walked up into missis' room, and she was dressed for church, sure enough, and sat dere reading her Bible. I laid it right down under her face, dat jacket. "You see dat hole!" said I. "You see dat blood! Alfred's killed! You killed him; his blood be on you and your chil'en! O, Lord God in heaven hear me, and render unto her double!"

Nina drew in her breath hard, with an instinctive shudder. Milly had drawn herself up, in the vehemence of her narration, and sat leaning forward, her black eyes dilated, her strong arms clenched before her, and her powerful frame expanding and working with the violence of her emotion. She might have looked, to one with mythological associations, like the figure of a black marble Nemesis in a trance of wrath. She sat so for a few minutes, and then her muscles relaxed, her eyes gradually softened; she looked tenderly, but solemnly, down on Nina.

* These are the exact facts of the story related by "Old Charity" to Mrs. Childs, as given in her "Letters from New York."

'Dem was awful words, chile ; but I was in Egypt den. I was wandering in de wilderness of Sinai. I had heard de sound of de trumpet, and de voice of words ; but, chile, I hadn't seen de Lord. Well—I went out, and I didn't speak no more to Miss Harrit. Dere was a great gulf fixed 'tween us ; and dere didn't no words pass over it. I did my work—I scorned not to do it ; but I didn't speak to her. Den it was, chile, dat I thought of what my mother told me, years ago ; it came to me, all fresh—"Chile, when trouble comes, you ask de Lord to help you ;" and I saw dat I hadn't asked de Lord to help me ; and now, says I to myself, de Lord can't help me ; 'cause he couldn't bring back Alfred, no way you could fix it ; and yet I wanted to find de Lord, 'cause I was so tossed up and down. I wanted just to go and say, "Lord, you see what dis woman has done." I wanted to put it to Him, if He'd stand up for such a thing as that. Lord, how de world, and everything, looked to me in dem times ! Everything goin' on in de way it did ; and dese yer Christians, dat said dat dey was going into de kingdom, doing as dey did ! I tell you, I sought de Lord early and late. Many nights I have been out in de woods, and laid on de ground till morning, calling and crying, and 'peared like nobody heerd me. O, how strange it used to look, when I looked up to de stars ! winking at me, so kind of still and solemn, but never saying a word ! Sometimes I got dat wild, it seemed as if I could tear a hole through de sky, 'cause I must find God. I had an errand to Him and I must find Him. Den I heard 'em read out de Bible, 'bout how de Lord met a man on a threshing-floor, and I thought maybe if I had a threshing-floor, he would come to me. So I threshed down a place just as hard as I could under de trees ; and den I prayed dere—but He didn't come.

'Den dere was coming a great camp-meeting ; and I thought I'd go and see if I could find de Lord dere ; because, you see, missus, she let her people go Sunday to de camp-meeting ; well, I went into de tents and heerd dem sing ; and I went afore dere altar, and I heerd preaching ; but it 'peared like it was no good. It didn't touch me nowhere ; and I couldn't see nothing to it. I heerd 'em read out of de Bible, "O, dat I knew where I might find him. I would come even to his seat. I would order my cause before him. I would fill my mouth with arguments ;" and I thought, sure enough, dat ar's just what I want. Well, came on dark night, and dey had all de camp-fires lighted up, and dey was singing de hymns round and round, and I went for to hear de preaching. And dere was a man—pale, lean man he was, with black eyes and black hair. Well, dat ar man, he preached a sermon, to be sure, I never shall forget. His text was, “He that spared not his own Son, but freely delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things?” Well, you see, the first sound of dis took me, because I’d lost my son. And de man, he told us who de Son of God was—Jesus—O, how sweet and beautiful he was! How he went round doing for folks. O, Lord, what a story dat ar was! And, den, how dey took him, and put de crown of thorns on his head, and hung him up bleeding, bleeding, and bleeding. God so loved us dat he let his own dear Son suffer all dat for us. Chile, I got up, and I went to de altar, and I kneeled down with de mourners: and I fell flat on my face, and dey said I was in a trance. Maybe I was. Where I was, I don’t know; but I saw de Lord! Chile, it seemed as if my very heart was still. I saw him, suffering, bearing with us, year in, and year out—bearing—bearing—bearing so patient! ’peared like, it wan’t just on de cross; but bearing, always, everywhar! O, chile, I saw how he loved us! —us all—all—every one on us! We dat hated each other so! ’Peared like he was usin’ his heart up for us, all de time—bleedin’ for us like he did on Calvary, and willin’ to bleed! O, chile, I saw what it was for me to be hatin’ like I’d hated! “O, Lord,” says I, “I give up! O, Lord, I never see you afore! I didn’t know—Lord, I’s a poor sinner! I won’t hate no more!” And O, chile, den dere come such a rush of love in my soul! Says I, “Lord, I ken love even de white folks!” And den came another rush; and says I, “Yes, Lord, I love poor Miss Harrit, dat’s sole all my chil’en, and been de death of my poor Alfred! I loves her!” Chile, I overcome—I did so!—I overcome by de blood of de Lamb—de Lamb! Yes, de Lamb, chile! ’cause if he’d been a lion I could a kept in! ’twas de Lamb dat overcome.

‘When I came to, I felt like a chile. I went home to Miss Harrit; and I hadn’t spoke peaceable to her since Alfred died. I went in to her. She’d been sick, and she was in her room, looking kinder pale and yellor, poor thing; ’cause her son, honey, he got drunk and ’bused her awful. I went in, and says I, “O, Miss Harrit, I’s seen de Lord! Miss Harrit, I an’t got no more hard feelins; I forgive ye, and loves ye with all my heart, just as de Lord does.” Honey, ye ought to see how dat woman cried! Says she, “Milly, I’s a great sinner.” Says I, “Miss Harrit, we’s sinners, both on us, but de Lord gives hisself for us both; and if he loves us poor sinners, we mustn't be hard on each other. Ye was tempted, honey," says I (for you see I felt like makin' scuses for her); "but de Lord Jesus has got a pardon for both on us." After dat, I didn't have no more trouble with Miss Harrit. Chile, we was sisters in Jesus. I bore her burdens, and she bore mine. And, dear, de burdens was heavy; for her son he was brought home a corpse; he shot hisself right through de heart, trying to load a gun when he was drunk. O, chile, I thought den how I'd prayed de Lord to render unto her double; but I had a better mind den. If I could have brought poor Mas'r George to life, I'd a done it; and I held de poor woman's head on my arm all dat ar night, and she a screamin' every hour. Well, dat ar took her down to de grave. She didn't live much longer; but she was ready to die. She sent and bought my daughter Lucy's son, dis here Tom, and gin him to me. Poor thing! she did all she could. I watched with her de night she died. O, Miss Nina, if ever ye're tempted to hate anybody, think how 't'll be with em when dey comes to die. She died hard, poor thing! and she was cast down 'bout her sins. "O, Milly," says she, "the Lord and you may forgive me, but I can't forgive myself." And says I to her, "O missis, don't think of it no more; de Lord's hid it in his own heart." O, but she struggled long, honey; she was all night dyin', and 'twas "Milly! Milly!" all the time! "O, Milly, stay with me!" And, chile, I felt I loved her like my own soul; and when de day broke, de Lord set her free, and I laid her down like she'd been one o' my babies. I took up her poor hand. It was warm, but the strength was all gone out on't; and, "O," I thought, "ye poor thing, how could I ever have hated ye so?" Ah, chile, we mustn't hate nobody; we's all poor creatures, and de dear Lord He loves us all.

CHAPTER XVII.

UNCLE JOHN.

ABOUT four miles east of Canema lay the plantation of Nina's uncle, whither Harry had been sent on the morning which we have mentioned. The young man went upon his errand in no very enviable mood of mind. Uncle Jack, as Nina always called him, was the nominal guardian of the estate, and a more friendly and indulgent one Harry could not have desired.

He was one of those joyous, easy souls, whose leading desire seemed to be that everybody in the world should make himself as happy as possible, without fatiguing him with consultations as to particulars. His confidence in Harry was unbounded; and he esteemed it a good fortune that it was so, as he was wont to say, laughingly, that his own place was more than he could manage. Like all gentlemen who make the study of their own ease a primary consideration, uncle Jack found the whole course of nature dead-set against him. For, as all creation is evidently organized with a view to making people work, it follows that no one has so much care as the man who resolves not to take any.

Uncle Jack was systematically, and, as a matter of course, cheated and fleeced by his overseers, by his negroes, and the poor whites of his vicinity; and, worst of all, continually hectored and lectured by his wife there for. Nature, or destiny, or whoever the lady may be that deals the matrimonial cards, with her usual thoughtfulness in balancing opposites, had arranged that jovial, easy, care-hating uncle John should have been united to a most undaunted and ever-active spirit of enterprise and resolution, who never left anything quiet in his vicinity. She it was who continually disturbed his repose, by constantly ferreting out, and bringing before his view all the plots, treasons, and conspiracies with which plantation-life is ever abounding, bringing down on his devoted head the necessity of discriminations, decisions, and settlements, most abhorrent to an easy man. The fact was, that responsibility, aggravated by her husband's negligence, had transformed the worthy woman into a sort of domestic dragon of the Hesperides; and her good helpmeet declared that he believed she never slept, nor meant anybody else should.

It was all very well, he would observe: he wouldn't quarrel with her for walking the whole night long, or sleeping with her head out of the window, watching the smoke-house; for stealing out after one o'clock to convict Pompey, or circumvent Cuffy, if she only wouldn't bother him with it. Suppose the half of the hams were carried off between two and three, and sold to Abijah Skinflint for rum? He must have his sleep; and if he had to pay for it in hams, why, he'd pay for it in ham; but sleep he must and would. And, supposing he really believed in his own soul, that Cuffy, who came in the morning, with a long face, to announce the theft, and to propose measures of discovery, was in fact the main conspirator, what then? He couldn't prove it on him. Cuffy had gone astray from the womb, speaking lies ever since he was born ; and what would be the use of his fretting and sweating himself to death to get truth out of Cuff? No, no! Mrs. G., as he commonly called his helpmeet, might do that sort of thing, but she mustn't bother him about it. Not that uncle Jack was invariable in his temper : human nature has its limits ; and a personage who finds ' mischief still for idle hands to do,' often seems to take a malicious pleasure in upsetting the temper of idle gentlemen.

So uncle Jack, though confessedly the best fellow in the world, was occasionally subject to a tropical whirlwind of passion, in which he would stamp, tear, and swear, with most astonishing energy ; and in those ignited moments all the pent-up sorrows of his soul would fly about him like red-hot shot in every direction. And then he would curse the negroes, curse the overseers, curse the plantation, curse Cuff and Pomp and Dinah, curse the poor white folks round, curse Mr. Abijah Skinslint, and declare that he would send them and the niggers all severally to a department which politeness forbids us to mention. He would pour out awful threats of cutting up, skinning alive, and selling to Georgia. To all which commotion and bluster the negroes would listen, rolling the whites of their eyes and sticking their tongues in their cheeks, with an air of great satisfaction and amusement, because experience had sufficiently proved to them that nobody had ever been cut up, skinned alive, or sent to Georgia, as the result of any of these outpourings. So when uncle Jack had one of these fits, they treated it as hens do an approaching thunder-storm—ran under cover, and waited for it to blow over. As to Madam Gordon, her wrath was another affair. And her threats they had learned to know generally meant something ; though it very often happened that, in the dispensation of most needed justice, uncle Jack, if in an extra good humour, would rush between the culprit and his mistress, and bear him off in triumph, at the risk of most serious consequences to himself afterwards.

Our readers are not to infer from this that Madam Gordon was really and naturally an ill-natured woman. She was only one of that denomination of vehement housekeepers who are to be found the world over—women to whom is appointed the hard mission of combating, single-handed, for the principles of order and exactness against a whole world in arms. Had she had the good fortune to have been born in Vermont or Massachusetts, she would have been known through the whole village as a woman who couldn't be cheated half a cent on a pound in meat, and had an instinctive knowledge whether a cord of wood was too short, or a pound of butter too light. Put such a woman at the head of the disorderly rabble of a plantation, with a cheating overseer, surrounded by thieving poor whites, to whom the very organization of society leaves no resource but thieving, with a never-mind husband, with land that has seen its best days, and is fast running to barrenness, and you must not too severely question her temper if it should not be at all times in perfect subjection. In fact, Madam Gordon's cap habitually bristled with horror, and she was rarely known to sit down. Occasionally, it is true, she alighted upon a chair; but was in a moment up again, to pursue some of her household train, or shout, at the top of her lungs, some caution toward the kitchen. When Harry reined up his horse before the plantation, the gate was thrown open for him by old Pomp, a superannuated negro, who reserved this function as his peculiar sinecure.

'Lord bress you, Harry, dat you? Bress you, you ought fur to see mas'r! Such a gale up to de house!'

'What's the matter, Pomp?'

'Why, mas'r, he done got one of he fits! Tarin round dar, fit to split! stompin' up and down the rudy, swarin' like mad! Lord, if he an't! He done got Jake tied up, dar! Swars he's goin' to cut him to pieces. He! he! he! Has so! Got Jake tied up dar! Ho! ho! ho! Real curus! and he's blowin' hisself out dere mighty hard, I tell you; so if you want to get word wid him, you can't do it till he done got through with dis yer!' And the old man ducked his pepper-and-salt-coloured head, and chuckled with a lively satisfaction.

As Harry rode slowly up the avenue to the house, he caught sight of the portly figure of its master, stamping up and down the verandah, vociferating and gesticulating in the most violent manner. He was a corpulent man of middle age, with a round, high forehead, set off with grizzled hair. His blue eyes, fair, rosy, fat face, his mouth adorned with brilliant teeth, gave him, when in good-humour, the air of a handsome and agreeable man. At present his countenance was flushed almost to purple, as he stood storming, from his rostrum, at a saucy, rugged negro, who, tied to the horse-post, stood the picture of unconcern; while a crowd of negro men, women, and children, were looking on.

'I'll teach you!' he vociferated, shaking his fist. 'I won't—won't bear it of you, yon dog, you! you won't take my orders, won't you? I'll kill you—that I will! I'll cut you up into inch-pieces!"

"No, you won't, and you know you won't!" interposed Mrs. Gordon, who sat at the window, behind him. "You won't, and you know you won't! and they know you won't, too! It will all end in smoke as it always does. I only wish you wouldn't talk and threaten, because it makes you ridiculous!"

"Hold your tongue, too! I'll be master in my own house, I say! Infernal dog! I say, Cuff, cut him up! Why don't you go at him? Give it to him! What you waiting for?"

"If mas'r pleases!" said Cuff, rolling up his eyes, and making a deprecating gesture.

"If I please! well, blast you, I do please! Go at him! thrash away! Stay, I'll come myself." And, seizing a cowhide, which lay near him, he turned up his cuffs, and ran down the steps, but missing his footing in his zeal, came head first against the very post where the criminal was tied. "There, I hope, now, you are satisfied! you have killed me! you have broke my head—you have! I shall be laid up for a month, all for you, you ungrateful dog!"

Cuffy and Sambo came to the rescue, raised him up carefully, and began brushing the dust off his clothes, smothering the laughter with which they seemed ready to explode, while the culprit at the post seemed to consider this an excellent opportunity to put in his submission.

"Please, mas'r, do forgive me! I tole 'em to go out, and dey said dey would'nt. I didn't mean no harm, when I said mas'r had better go hisself, 'cause I thinks so now; mas'r had better go! Dem folks is curus, and dey won't go for none of us. Dey just acts ridiculous, dey does! and I didn't mean fur to be sarcy, nor nothin'! I say, 'gen, if mas'r 'll take his horse and go over dar, mas'r drive dose folks out; and nobody else can't do it! We none can't do it—dey jest sarce us. Now, for my Heavenly Master, all dis yere is de truth I've been telling. De Lord de Master knows it is; and, if mas'r 'll take his horse, and ride down dere, he'd see so, so dere, just as I've been telling mas'r. I didn't mean no harm at all, I didn't!"

The quarrel, it must be told, related to the ejecting of a poor white family, which had squatted, as the phrase is, in a deserted cabin, on a distant part of the Gordon plantation. Mrs. Gordon's untiring assiduity having discovered this fact, she had left her husband no peace till something was undertaken in the way of ejection. He accordingly commissioned Jake, a stout negro, on the morning of the present day, to go over and turn them off. Now Jake, who inherited to the full the lofty contempt with which the plantation negro regards the poor white folks, started upon his errand nothing loth, and whistled his way in high feather, with two large dogs at his heels. But, when he found a miserable, poor, sick woman, surrounded by four starving children, Jake's mother's milk came back to him, and, instead of turning them out he actually pitched a dish of cold potatoes in among them which he picked up in a neighbouring cabin, with about the same air of contemptuous pity with which one throws scraps to a dog. And then, meandering his way back to the house, informed his master that 'He couldn't turn de white trash out; and, if he wanted them turned out, he would have to go hisself.'

Now, we all know that a fit of temper has very often nothing to do with the thing which appears to give rise to it. When a cloud is full charged with electricity, it makes no difference which bit of wire is put in, the flash and the thunder come one way as well as another. Mr. Gordon had received troublesome letters on business, a troublesome lecture from his wife, his corn-cake had been overdone at breakfast, and his coffee burned bitter, besides which he had a cold in his head coming on, and there was a settlement brewing with the overseer. In consequence of all which things, though Jake's mode of delivering himself wasn't a whit more saucy than ordinary, the storm broke upon him then and there, and raged as we have described. The heaviest part of it, however, being now spent, Mr. Gordon consented to pardon the culprit on condition that he would bring him up his horse immediately, when he would ride over and see if he couldn't turn out the offending party. He pressed Harry, who was rather a favourite of his, into the service; and, in the course of a quarter of an hour, they were riding off in the direction of the squatter's cabin.

'It's perfectly insufferable what we proprietors have to bear from this tribe of creatures!' he said. 'There ought to be hunting-parties got up to chase them down, and exterminate 'em just as we do rats. It would be a kindness to them; the only thing you can do for them is to kill them. As for charity, or that kind of thing, you might as well throw victuals into the hollow logs as to try to feed 'em. The government ought to pass laws—we will have laws, somehow or other—and get them out of the state.'

And, so discoursing, the good man at length arrived before the door of a miserable, decaying log-cabin, out of whose glassless windows dark emptiness looked, as out of the eye-holes of a skull. Two scared, cowering children disappeared round the corner as he approached. He kicked open the door, and entered. Crouched on a pile of dirty straw, sat a miserable, haggard woman, with large, wild eyes, sunken cheeks, dishevelled, matted hair, and long lean hands, like bird's claws. At her skinny breast an emaciated infant was hanging, pushing, with its little skeleton hands, as if to force the nourishment which nature no longer gave; and two scared-looking children, with features wasted and pinched blue with famine, were clinging to her gown. The whole group huddled together, drawing as far as possible away from the new-comer, looked up with large, frightened eyes, like hunted wild animals.

'What you here for?' was the first question of Mr. Gordon, put in no very decided tone, for, if the truth must be told, his combativeness was oozing out. The woman did not answer, and, after a pause, the youngest child piped up, in a shrill voice:—

'An't got nowhere else to be!'

'Yes,' said the woman, 'we camped on Mr. Durant's place; and Botfield, him is the overseer, pulled down the cabin right over our head. 'Pears like we couldn't get nowhere.'

'Where is your husband?'

'Gone looking for work. 'Pears like he couldn't get none nowhere: 'pears like nobody wants us. But we have got to be somewhere, though,' said the woman in a melancholy, apologetic tone; 'we can't die, as I see—wish we could!'

Mr. Gordon's eye fell upon two or three cold potatoes in a piece of broken crock, over which the woman appeared keeping jealous guard.

'What you doing with those potatoes?'

'Saving them for the children's dinner.'

'And is that all you've got to eat, I want to know?' said Mr. Gordon, in a high, sharp tone, as if he were getting angry very fast.

'Yes,' said the woman.

'What did you have to eat yesterday?'

'Nothing,' said the woman.

'And what did you eat the day before?'

'Found some old bones round the nigger-houses; and some on 'em give us some corn-cake.'

'Why the devil didn't you send up to my house, and get some bacon? Picking up bones, slop, and swill, round the nigger-huts! Why didn't you send up for some ham, and some meal? Lord bless you, you don't think Madam Gordon is a dog, to bite you, do you? Wait here till I send you down something fit to eat. Just end in my having to take care of you, I see! And, if you are going to stay here, there will be something to be done to keep the rain out. There now,' he said to Harry, as he was mounting his horse, 'just see what 'tis to be made with hooks in one's back, like me! Everybody hangs on to me, of course! Now, there's Durant turns off these folks; there's Peters turns them off: well, what's the consequence? They come and litter down on me, just because I am an easy, soft-hearted old fool! It's too devilish bad! They breed like rabbits! What God Almighty makes such people for, I don't know! I suppose He does. But there's these poor, miserable trash have children like sixty; and there's folks living in splendid houses, dying for children, and can't have any. If they manage one or two, the scarlet-fever, or whooping-cough makes off with 'em. Lord bless me, things go on in a terrible mixed-up way in this world. And, then, what upon earth I'm to say to Mrs. G. I know what she'll say to me. She'll tell me she told me so—that's what she always says. I wish she'd go and see them herself—I do so! Mrs. G. is the nicest kind of woman—no mistake about that; but she has an awful deal of energy, that woman. It's dreadful fatiguing to a quiet man, like me—dreadful! But I'm sure I don't know what I should do without her. She'll be down upon me about this woman; but the woman must have some ham, that's flat. Cold potatoes and old bones! Pretty story! Such people have no business to live at all; but, if they will live, they ought to eat Christian things. There goes Jake—why couldn't he turn 'em off before I saw 'em? It would have saved me all this plague. The dog knew what he was about when he got me down here. Jake! O, Jake, Jake! come here!'

Jake came shambling along up to his master, with an external appearance of the deepest humility, under which was too plainly seen to lurk a facetious air of waggish satisfaction.

'Here, you, Jake; you get a basket.'

'Yes, mas'r!' said Jake, with an air of provoking intelligence.

'Be still, saying, "Yes, mas'r," and hear what I've got to say. Mind yourself!' Jake gave a side-glance of inexpressible drollery at Harry, and then stood like an ebony statue of submission.

'You go to your missis, and ask her for the key of the smoke-house, and bring it to me.'

'Yes, sir.'

'And you tell your missis to send me a peck of meal. Stay—a loaf of bread, or some biscuit, or corn-cake, or anything else which may happen to be baked up. Tell her I want them sent out right away.' Jake bowed and disappeared. 'Now we may as well ride down this path, while he is gone for the things. Mrs. G. will blow off on him first, so that rather less of it will come upon me. I wish I could get her to see them herself. Lord bless her, she is a kind-hearted woman enough! but she thinks there's no use doing,—and there an't. She is right enough about it. But, then, as the woman says, there must be some place for them to be in the world. 'The world is wide enough, I'm sure. Plague take it! why can't we pass a law to take them all in with our niggers, and then they'd have some one to take care of them? 'Then we'd do something for them, and there'd be some hope of keeping 'em comfortable.'

Harry felt in no wise inclined to reply to any of this conversation, because he knew that, though nominally addressed to him, the good gentleman was talking merely for the sake of easing his mind, and that he would have opened his heart just as freely to the next hickory-bush, if he had not happened to be present. So he let him expend himself, waiting for an opportunity to introduce subjects which lay nearer his heart. In a convenient pause, he found opportunity to say—

'Miss Nina sent me over here, this morning.'

'Ah, Nin! my pretty little Nin! Bless the child! She did? Why couldn't she come over herself, and comfort an old fellow's heart? Nin is the prettiest girl in the country; I tell you that, Harry!'

'Miss Nina is in a good deal of trouble. Master Tom came home last night drunk, and to-day he is so cross and contrary she can't do anything with him.'

'Drunk? O, what a sad dog! Tom gets drunk too often. Carries that too far, altogether. Told him that, the last time I talked to him. Says I, "Tom, it does very well for a young man to have a spree once in one or two months. I did it myself when I was young. 'But," says I, "Tom, to spree all the time won't do, Tom," says I. "Nobody minds a fellow being drunk occasionally; but he ought to be moderate about it, and know where to stop," says I; "because when it comes to that, that he is drunk every day, or every other day, why, it's my opinion that he may consider the devil's got him!" I talked to Tom just so, right out square; because, you see, I'm in a father's place to him. But, Lord, it don't seem to have done him a bit of good! Good Lord! they tell me he is drunk one-half his time, and acts like a crazy creature! Goes too far, Tom does, altogether. Mrs. G. an't got any patience with him. She blasts at him every time he comes here, and he blasts at her. So it an't very comfortable having him here. Good woman at heart Mrs. Gordon, but a little strong in her ways, you know. And Tom is strong, too. So it's fire fight fire, when they get together. It's noways comfortable to a man wanting to have everybody happy around him. Lord bless me! I wish Nin were my daughter! Why can't she come over here, and live with me? She hasn't got any more spirit in her than just what I like. Just enough fizz in her to keep one from flatting out. What about those beaux of hers? Is she going to be married? Hey?

'There's two gentleman there, attending upon Miss Nina. One is Mr. Carson, of New York—'

'Hang it all! she isn't going to marry a d——d Yankee Why, brother would turn over in his grave!'

'I don't think it will be necessary to put himself to that trouble,' said Harry; 'for I rather think it's Mr. Clayton who is to be the favoured one.'

'Clayton! Good blood!—like that! Seems to be a gentlemanly, good fellow, doesn't he?'

'Yes, sir: he owns a plantation, I'm told, in South Carolina.'

'Ah! ah! that's well! But I hate to spare Nin. I never half liked sending her off to New York. Don't believe in boarding-schools. I've seen as fine girls grown on plantations as any man need want. What do we want to send our girls there, to get fipenny-bit ideas? I thank the Lord I never was in New York, and I never mean to be. Carolina born and raised I am; and my wife is Virginia—pure breed! No boarding-school about her! And, when I stood up to be married to her, there wasn't a girl in Virginia could stand up with her. Her cheeks were like damask-roses! A tall, straight, lively girl, she was. Knew her own mind, and had a good notion of speaking it, too. And there isn't a woman, now, that can get through the business she can, and have her eyes always on everything. If it does make me uncomfortable, every now and then, I ought to take it, and thank the Lord for it. Lor, if it wan't for her, what with the overseer, and the niggers, and the poor white trash, we should all go to the devil in a heap!

'Miss Nina sent me over here to be out of Master Tom's way,' said Harry, after a pause. 'He is bent upon hectoring me as usual. You know, sir, that he always had a spite against me, and it seems to grow more and more bitter. He quarrels with her about the management of everything on the place; and you know, sir, that I try to do my very best, and you and Mrs. Gordon have always been pleased to say that I did well.'

'So we did, Harry, my boy; so we did. Stay here as long as you like. Just suit yourself about that. May be you'd like to go out shooting with me?'

'I'm worried,' said Harry, 'to be obliged to be away just at the time of putting in the seed. Everything depends upon my overseeing.'

'Why don't you go back, then? Tom's ugliness is nothing but because he is drunk. There's where it is—I see through it. You see, when a fellow has had a drunken spree, why, the day after it he is all at loose ends and cross nerves, all ravelled out, like an old stocking. Then fellows are sulky and surly like. I've heard of their having temperance societies up in those northern states, and I think something of that sort would be good for our young men. They get drunk too often. Full a third of them, I should reckon, get the delirium tremens before they are fifty. If we could have a society like them, and that sort of thing, and agree to be moderate! Nobody expects young men to be old before their time; but, if they'd agree not to blow out more than once a month, or something in that way.'

'I'm afraid,' said Harry, 'master Tom's too far gone for that.'

'O, ah, yes! Pity—pity! Suppose it is so. Why, when a fellow gets so far, he's like a nigger's old patched coat—you can't tell where the real cloth is. Now Tom I suppose, he never is himself; always up on a wave, or down in the trough. Heigho! I'm sorry!'

'It's very hard on Miss Nina,' said Harry. 'He interferes, and I have no power to stand for her. And, yesterday, he began talking to my wife in a way I can't bear, nor won't! He must let her alone.'

'Sho! sho!' said Mr. Gordon. 'See what a boy that is now! That an't in the least worth while, that an't. I shall tell Tom so; and, Harry, mind your temper! Remember, young man, will be young; and, if a fellow will treat himself to a pretty wife, he must expect trials. But Tom ought not to do so. I shall tell him. High! there comes Jake, with the basket and the smoke-house key. Now for something to send down to those poor hobgoblins. If people are going to starve, they must'nt come on my place to do it. I don't mind what I don't see. I wouldn't mind if the whole litter of 'em was drowned to-morrow; but, hang it, I can't stand it, if I know it! So, here, Jake, take this ham and bread, and look 'em up an old skillet; and see if you can't tinker up the house a bit. I'd set the fellow to work, when he comes back; only we have two hands to every turn, now, and the niggers always plague 'em. Harry, you go home, and tell Nin Mrs. G. and I will be over to dinner.'

CHAPTER XVIII.

DRED.

HARRY spent the night at the place of Mr. John Gordon, and arose the next morning in a very discontented mood of mind. Nothing is more vexatious to an active and enterprising person than to be thrown into a state of entire idleness; and Harry, after lounging about for a short time in the morning, found his indignation increased by every moment of enforced absence from the scene of his daily labours and interests. Having always enjoyed substantially the privileges of a freeman in the liberty to regulate his time according to his own ideas, to come and go, to buy and sell, and transact business unfettered by any felt control, he was the more keenly alive to the degradation implied in his present position.

'Here I must skulk around,' said he to himself, 'like a partridge in the bushes, allowing everything to run at loose ends, preparing the way for my being found fault with for a lazy fellow, by-and-by; and all for what? Because my younger brother chooses to come, without right or reason, to domineer over me, to insult my wife; and because the laws will protect him in it, if he does it. Ah! ah! that's it. They are all leagued together. No matter how right I am—no matter how bad he is. Everybody will stand up for him, and put me down; all because my grandmother was born in Africa, and his grandmother was born in America. Confound it all, I won't stand it!

Who knows what he'll be saying and doing to Lisette while I am gone? I'll go back and face him, like a man! I'll keep straight about my business, and, if he crosses me, let him take care! He hasn't got but one life, any more than I have. Let him look out!' And Harry jumped upon his horse, and turned his head homeward. He struck into a circuitous path, which led along that immense belt of swampy land, to which the name of Dismal has been given. As he was riding along, immersed in thought, the clatter of horses' feet was heard in front of him. A sudden turn of the road brought him directly facing to Tom Gordon and Mr. Jekyl, who had risen early, and started off on horseback, in order to reach a certain stage-dépôt before the heat of the day. There was a momentary pause on both sides; when Tom Gordon, like one who knows his power, and is determined to use it to the utmost, broke out, scornfully:—

'Stop, you damned nigger, and tell your master where you are going!

'You are not my master,' said Harry, in words whose concentrated calmness, conveyed more bitterness and wrath than could have been given by the most violent outburst.

'You d—d whelp!' said Tom Gordon, striking him across the face twice, with his whip, take that, and that! We'll see if I'm not your master! There, now, help yourself, won't you? Isn't that a master's mark?

It had been the life-long habit of Harry's position to repress every emotion of anger within himself. But, at this moment, his face wore a deadly and frightful expression. Still, there was something majestic and almost commanding in the attitude with which he reined back his horse, and slowly lifted his hand to heaven. He tried to speak, but his voice was choked with repressed passion. At last he said:—'You may be sure, Mr. Gordon, this mark will never be forgotten!'

There are moments of high excitement, when all that is in a human being seems to be roused, and to concentrate itself in the eye and the voice. And, in such moments, any man, apparently, by virtue of his mere humanity, by the mere awfulness of the human soul that is in him, gains power to overawe those who in other hours scorn him. There was a minute's pause in which neither spoke; and Mr. Jekyl, who was a man of peace, took occasion to touch Tom's elbow and say: 'It seems to me this isn't worth while—we shall miss the stage.' And as Harry had already turned his horse and was riding away, Tom Gordon turned his, shouting after him with a scornful laugh—‘I called on your wife before I came away, this morning, and I liked her rather better the second time than I did the first!’

This last taunt flew like a Parthian arrow backward, and struck into the soul of the bondman with even a keener power than the degrading blow. The sting of it seemed to rankle more bitterly as he rode along, till at last he dropped the reins on his horse’s neck, and burst into a transport of bitter cursing.

‘Aha! aha! it has come nigh thee, has it? It toucheth thee, and thou faintest!’ said a deep voice from the swampy thicket beside him.

Harry stopped his horse and his imprecations. There was a crackling in the swamp and a movement among the copse of briars; and at last the speaker emerged, and stood before Harry. He was a tall black man, of magnificent stature and proportions. His skin was intensely black, and polished like marble. A loose shirt of red flannel, which opened very wide at the breast, gave a display of a neck and chest of herculean strength. The sleeves of the shirt rolled up nearly to the shoulders, showed the muscles of a gladiator. The head, which rose with an imperial air from the broad shoulders, was large and massive, and developed with equal force both in the reflective and perceptive department. The perceptive organs jutted like dark ridges over the eyes, while that part of the head which phrenologists attribute to the moral and intellectual sentiments rose like an ample dome above them. The large eyes had that peculiar and solemn effect of unfathomable blackness and darkness which is often a striking characteristic of the African eye. But there burned in them, like tongues of flame in a black pool of naphtha, a subtle and restless fire, that betokened habitual excitement to the verge of insanity. If any organs were predominant in the head, they were those of ideality, wonder, veneration, and firmness; and the whole combination was such as might have formed one of the wild old warrior prophets of the heroic ages. He wore a fantastic sort of turban, apparently of an old scarlet shawl, which added to the outlandish effect of his appearance. His nether garments, of coarse negro-cloth, were girded round the waist by a strip of scarlet flannel, in which was thrust a bowie-knife and hatchet. Over one shoulder he carried a rifle, and a shot-pouch was suspended to his belt. A rude game-bag hung upon his arm. Wild and startling as the apparition might have been, it appeared to be no stranger to Harry; for, after the first movement of surprise, he said, in a tone of familiar recognition, in which there was blended somewhat of awe and respect—

‘O, it is you, then, Dred! I did not know that you were hearing me!’

‘Have I not heard?’ said the speaker, raising his arm, and his eyes gleaming with wild excitement. ‘How long wilt thou halt between two opinions? Did not Moses refuse to be called the son of Pharaoh’s daughter? How long wilt thou cast in thy lot with the oppressors of Israel, who say unto thee, “Bow down that we may walk over thee?” Shall not the Red Sea be divided? Yea, saith the Lord, it shall!’

‘Dred! I know what you mean!’ said Harry, trembling with excitement.

‘Yea, thou dost!’ said the figure. ‘Yea, thou dost! Hast thou not eaten the fat and drunk the sweet with the oppressor, and hid thine eyes from the oppression of thy people? Have not our wives been for a prey, and thou hast not regarded? Hath not our cheek been given to the smiter? Have we not been counted as sheep for the slaughter? But thou saidst, Lo! I knew it not, and didst hide thine eyes! Therefore, the curse of Meroz is upon thee, saith the Lord. And thou shalt bow down to the oppressor, and his rod shall be upon thee. And thy wife shall be for a prey!’

‘Don’t talk in that way! don’t!’ said Harry, striking out his hands with a frantic gesture, as if to push back the words. ‘You are raising the very devil in me!’

‘Look here, Harry,’ said the other, dropping from the high tone he at first used to that of common conversation, and speaking in bitter irony, ‘did your master strike you? It’s sweet to kiss the rod, isn’t it? Bend your neck and ask to be struck again!—wont you? Be meek and lowly; that’s the religion for you! You are a slave, and you wear broadcloth, and sleep soft. By and by he will give you a fip to buy salve for those cuts! Don’t fret about your wife! Women always like the master better than the slave! Why shouldn’t they? When a man licks his master’s foot, his wife scorns him,—serves him right. Take it meekly, my boy! “Servants, obey your masters.” Take your master’s old coats—take your wife when he’s done with her—and bless God that brought you under the light of the gospel! Go! you are a slave! But, as for me,’ he said, drawing up his head, and throwing back his shoulders with a deep inspiration, ‘I am a free man! Free by this,’ holding out his rifle. 'Free by the Lord of hosts, that numbereth the stars, and calleth them forth by their names. Go home—that's all I have to say to you! You sleep in a curtained bed—I sleep on the ground, in the swamps! You eat the fat of the land—I have what the ravens bring me! But no man whips me;—no man touches my wife;—no man says to me, "Why do ye so?" Go! You are a slave!—I am free!' And, with one athletic bound, he sprang into the thicket, and was gone.

The effect of this address on the already excited mind of the bondman may be better conceived than described. He ground his teeth, and clenched his hands. 'Stop!' he cried: 'Dred, I will—I will—I'll do as you tell me—I will not be a slave!' A scornful laugh was the only reply, and the sound of crackling footsteps retreated rapidly. He who retreated struck up, in a clear, loud voice, one of those peculiar melodies in which vigour and spirit are blended with a wild, inexpressible mournfulness. The voice was one of a singular and undescribable quality of tone, it was heavy as the sub-bass of an organ, and of a velvety softness, and yet it seemed to pierce the air with a keen dividing force which is generally characteristic of voices of much less volume. The words were the commencement of a wild camp-meeting hymn, much in vogue in those parts:

"Brethren, don't you hear the sound?
The martial trumpet now is blowing;
Men in order listing round,
And soldiers to the standard flowing."

There was a wild, exultant fulness of liberty that rolled in the note; and to Harry's excited ear, there seemed in it a fierce challenge of contempt to his imbecility, and his soul at that moment seemed to be rent asunder with a pang such as only those can know who have felt what it is to be a slave. There was an uprising within him—vague, tumultuous, overpowering; dim instincts, heroic aspirations; the will to do, the soul to dare; and then, in a moment, there followed the picture of all society leagued against him, the hopeless impossibility of any outlet to what was burning within him. The waters of a nature naturally noble, pent up, and without outlet, rolled back upon his heart with a suffocating force; and, in his hasty anguish, he cursed the day of his birth. The spasm of his emotion was interrupted by the sudden appearance of Milly coming along the path.

'Why, bless you, Milly,' said Harry, in sudden surprise, 'where are you going?'

'O, bless you, honey, chile, I's gwine on to take de stage. Dey wanted to get up de wagon for me; but bless you, says I, what you s'pose the Lord gin us legs for? I never wants no critters to tug me round, when I can walk myself. And, den, honey, it's so pleasant like, to be a walking along in de bush here, in de morning; 'pears like de voice of de Lord is walking among de trees. But, bless you, chile, honey, what's de matter o' yer face?'

'It's Tom Gordon, d—n him!' said Harry.

'Don't talk dat ar way, chile,' said Milly, using the freedom with Harry which her years and weight of character had gradually secured for her among the members of the plantation.'

'I will talk that way! Why shouldn't I? I am not going to be good any longer.'

'Why, 't won't help de matter to be bad, will it Harry? 'Cause, you hate Tom Gordon, does you want to act just like him?'

'No!' said Harry, 'I won't be like him, but I'll have my revenge! Old Dred has been talking to me again this morning. He always did stir me up so that I could hardly live; and I won't stand it any longer.'

'Chile,' said Milly, 'you take care. Keep clear on him. He's in de wilderness of Sinai; he is with de blackness, and darkness, and tempest. He an't come to de heavenly Jerusalem. O! O! honey! dere's a blood of sprinkling dat speaketh better things dan dat of Abel. Jerusalem above is free—is free, honey; so don't you mind, now, what happens in dis yer time.'

'Ah, ah, aunt Milly, this may do well enough for old women like you; but you stand opposite to a young fellow like me, with good strong arms, and a pair of double fists, and a body and soul just as full of fight as they can be; it don't answer to go telling about a heavenly Jerusalem. We want something here. We'll have it, too. How do you know there is any heaven any how?'

'Know it?' said Milly, her eye kindling, and striking her staff on the ground—'Know it? I knows it by de hankering arter it I got in here'—giving her broad chest a blow which made it resound like a barrel. 'De Lord knowed what he was 'bout when he made us. When he made babies rooting round, with der poor little mouths open, he made milk, and de mummies for 'em, too. Chile, we's nothing but great babies, dat an't got our eyes opened, rooting round and round; but de Father 'll feed us yet—he will so.'

'He's a long time about it,' said Harry, sullenly.

'Well, chile, an't it a long time 'fore your corn sprouts—a long time 'fore it gets into de ears? but you plants, for all dat. What's dat to me what I is here? Shan't I reign with de Lord Jesus?'

'I don't know,' said Harry.

'Well, honey, I does. Just so sure as I's standing on dis yer ground, I knows in a few years I shall be reigning with de Lord Jesus, and a casting my crown at his feet. Dat's what I knows. Flesh and blood didn't reveal it unto me, but de Spirit of de Father. It's no odds to me what I does here; every road leads straight to glory, and de glory an't got no end to it.'" And Milly uplifted her voice in a favourite stave:—

"When we've been dere ten thousand years
Bright shining like de sun,
We've no less days to sing God's praise
Than when we first begun."

'Chile,' said she to him, solemnly, 'I an't a fool. Does ye s'pose dat I thinks folks has any business to be setting on der cheers all der life long, and working me, and living on my money? Why, I knows dey an't. An't it all wrong, from fust to last, de way dey makes merchandize o' us? Why, I knows it is; but I's still about it, for de Lord's sake. I don't work for Miss Loo—I works for de Lord Jesus; and he is good pay, no mistake, now, I tell you.'

'Well,' said Harry, a little shaken, but not convinced, 'after all, there isn't much use in trying to do any other way. But you're lucky in feeling so, aunt Milly; but I can't.'

'Well, chile, any way, don't you do nothing rash, and don't you hear him. Dat ar way out is through seas of blood. Why, chile, would you turn against Miss Nina? Chile, if they get a-going, they won't spare nobody. Don't you start up dat ar tiger, 'cause I tell yè ye can't chain him if ye do.'

'Yes,' said Harry, 'I see it's all madness, perfect madness; there's no use thinking, no use talking. Well, good morning, aunt Milly. Peace go with you!' And the young man started his horse, and was soon out of sight.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CONSPIRATORS.

WE owe our readers now some words of explanation respecting the new personage who has been introduced into our history; therefore we must go back somewhat, and allude to certain historical events of painful significance. It has been a problem to many how the system of slavery in America should unite the two apparent inconsistencies of a code of slave-laws more severe than that of any other civilized nation, with an average practice at least as indulgent as any other; for bad as slavery is at the best, it may yet be admitted that the practice, as a whole, has been less cruel in this country than in many. An examination into history will show us that the cruelty of the laws resulted from the effects of indulgent practice.

During the first years of importation of slaves into South Carolina they enjoyed many privileges. Those who lived in intelligent families, and had any desire to learn, were instructed in reading and writing. Liberty was given them to meet in assemblies of worship, in class-meetings, and otherwise, without the presence of white witnesses; and many were raised to situations of trust and consequence. The result of this was the development of a good degree of intelligence and manliness among the slaves. There arose among them grave, thoughtful, energetic men, with their ears and eyes open, and their minds constantly awake to compare and reason. When minds come into this state, in a government professing to be founded on principles of universal equality, it follows that almost every public speech, document, or newspaper, becomes an incendiary publication. Of this fact the southern slave states have ever exhibited the most singular unconsciousness. Documents containing sentiments most dangerous for slaves to hear have been publicly read and applauded among them. The slave has heard, amid shouts, on the fourth of July, that his masters held the truth to be self-evident, that all men were born equal, and had an inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that all governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. Even the mottoes of newspapers have embodied sentiments of the most insurrectionary character. Such inscriptions as 'Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God,' stand, to this day, in large letters, at the head of southern newspapers, while speeches of senators and public men, in which the principles of universal democracy are asserted, are constant matters of discussion.

Under such circumstances it is difficult to induce the servant, who feels that he is a man, to draw those lines which seem so obvious to masters, by whom this fact has been forgotten. Accordingly, we find that when the discussions for the admission of Missouri as a slave state produced a wave whose waters indulated in every part of the union, there were found among the slaves, men of unusual thought and vigour, who were no inattentive witnesses and listeners. The discussions were printed in the newspapers; and what was printed in the newspapers was further discussed at the post-office door, in the tavern, in the bar-room, at the dinner-party, where black servants were listening behind the chairs. A free coloured man in the city of Charleston, named Denmark Vesey, was the one who had the hardihood to seek to use the electric fluid in the cloud thus accumulated. He conceived the hopeless project of imitating the example set by the American race, and achieving independence for the blacks. Our knowledge of this man is derived entirely from the printed reports of the magistrates who gave an account of the insurrection of which he was the instigator, and who will not, of course, be supposed to be unduly prejudiced in his favour. They state that he was first brought to the country by one Captain Vesey, a young lad, distinguished for personal beauty and great intelligence, and that he proved for twenty years a most faithful slave; but on drawing a prize of fifteen hundred dollars in a lottery, he purchased his freedom of his master, and worked as a carpenter in the city of Charleston. He was distinguished for strength and activity; and, as the accounts state, maintained such an irreproachable character, and enjoyed so much the confidence of the whites, that when he was accused, the charge was not only discredited, but he was not even arrested for several days after, and not till the proof of his guilt had become too strong to be doubted. His historians go on, with considerable naïveté, to remark: "It is difficult to conceive what motive he had to enter into such a plot, unless it was the one mentioned by one of the witnesses, who said that Vesey had several children who were slaves, and that he said, on one occasion, he wished he could see them free, as he himself artfully remarked in his defence on his trial."

It appears that the project of rousing and animating the blacks to this enterprise occupied the mind of Vesey for more than four years, during which time he was continually taking opportunities to animate and inspire the spirits of his countrymen. The account states that the speeches in Congress of those opposed to the admission of Missouri into the union, perhaps garbled and misrepresented, furnished him with ample means for inflaming the minds of the coloured population.

"Even while walking in the street," the account goes on to say, "he was not idle; for if his companion bowed to a white person, as slaves universally do, he would rebuke him, and observe that all men were born equal, and that he was surprised that any one would degrade himself by such conduct; that he would never cringe to the whites; nor ought any one to, who had the feeling of a man.*"

"When answered, 'We are slaves,' he would say, sarcastically and indignantly, 'You deserve to remain slaves!' And if he were further asked, 'What can we do?' he would remark, 'Go and buy a spelling-book, and read the fable of Hercules and the Wagoner.' He also sought every opportunity of entering into conversation with white persons, during which conversation he would artfully introduce some bold remark on slavery; and sometimes, when, from the character he was conversing with, he found he might be still bolder, he would go so far that, had not his declarations been clearly proved, he would scarcely have been credited."

But his great instrument of influence was a book that has always been prolific of insurrectionary movements, under all systems of despotism:—

"He rendered himself perfectly familiar with all those parts of Scripture which he thought he could pervert to his purpose, and would readily quote them to prove that slavery was contrary to the laws of God, and that slaves were bound to attempt their emancipation, however shocking and bloody might be the consequences; that such efforts would not only be pleasing to the Almighty, but were absolutely enjoined."

Vesey, in the course of time, associated with himself five slave men of marked character—Rolla, Ned, Peter, Monday, and Gullah Jack. Of these the account goes on to say:—

"In the selection of his leaders, Vesey showed great penetration and sound judgment. Rolla was plausible, and possessed

* These extracts are taken from the Official Report, “ uncommon self-possession ; bold and ardent, he was not to be “ deterred from his purpose by danger. Ned’s appearance indi“ cated that he was a man of firm nerves and desperate courage.

 “ Peter was intrepid and resolute, true to his engagements, and “ cautious in observing secrecy where it was necessary ; he was “ not to be daunted or impeded by difficulties, and though con“ fident of success, was careful in providing against any obstacles “ or casualties which might arise, and intent upon discovering “ every means which might be in their power, if thought of “ beforehand. Gullah Jack was regarded as a sorcerer, and, as “ such, feared by the natives of Africa, who believe in witchcraft.
 “ He was not only considered invulnerable, but that he could “ make others so by his charms, and that he could, and certainly “ would, provide all his followers with arms. He was artful, “ cruel, bloody ; his disposition, in short, was diabolical. His “ influence among the Africans was inconceivable. Monday was “ firm, resolute, discreet, and intelligent.

“ It is a melancholy truth that the general good conduct of all the “ leaders, except Gullah Jack, was such as rendered them objects “ least liable to suspicion. Their conduct had secured them, not “ only the unlimited confidence of their owners, but they had been “ indulged in every comfort, and allowed every privilege com“ patible with their situation in the community ; and though “ Gullah Jack was not remarkable for the correctness of his de“ portment, he by no means sustained a bad character. But,”
 “ adds the report, “ not only were the leaders of good character,
 “ and very much indulged by their owners, but this was very “ generally the case with all who were convicted, many of them “ possessing the highest confidence of their owners, and not one a “ bad character.”

“ The conduct and behaviour of Vesey and his five leaders “ during their trial and imprisonment may be interesting to many.
 “ When Vesey was tried, he folded his arms, and seemed to pay “ great attention to the testimony given against him, but with his “ eyes fixed on the floor. In this situation he remained im“ movable until the witnesses had been examined by the court, “ and cross-examined by his counsel, when he requested to be “ allowed to examine the witnesses himself, which he did. The “ evidence being closed, he addressed the court at considerable “ length. When he received his sentence, tears trickled down his “ cheeks. Rolla, when arraigned, affected not to understand the “ charge against him ; and when, at his request, it was explained

“to him, assumed, with wonderful adroitness, astonishment and surprise. He was remarkable throughout his trial for composure and great presence of mind. When he was informed that he was convicted, and was advised to prepare for death, he appeared perfectly confounded, but exhibited no signs of fear. In Ned’s behaviour there was nothing remarkable. His countenance was stern and immovable, even while he was receiving sentence of death. From his looks it was impossible to discover or conjecture what were his feelings. Not so with Peter Poyes. In his countenance were strongly-marked disappointed ambition, revenge, indignation, and an anxiety to know how far the discoveries had extended. He did not appear to fear personal consequences, for his whole behaviour indicated the reverse, but exhibited an evident anxiety for the success of their plan, in which his whole soul was embarked. His countenance and behaviour were the same when he received his sentence, and his only words were on retiring, ‘I suppose you’ll let me see my wife and family before I die,’ and that in no supplicating tone. When he was asked a day or two after, if it was possible that he could see his master and family murdered, who had treated him so kindly? he replied to the question only by a smile. In their prisons the convicts resolutely refused to make any confessions or communications which might implicate others; and Peter Poyes sternly enjoined it upon them to maintain this silence—‘Do not open your lips; die silent, as you will see me do;’ and in this resolute silence they met their fate. Twenty-two of the conspirators were executed upon one gallows.”

The account says “that Peter Poyes was one of the most active of the recruiting agents. All the principal of the conspirators kept a list of those who had consented to join them, and Peter was said by one of the witnesses to have had six hundred names on his list; but, so resolutely to the last did he observe his pledge of secrecy to his associates, that, of the whole number arrested and tried, not one of them belonged to his company. In fact, in an insurrection in which thousands of persons were supposed to have been implicated, only thirty-six were convicted.”

Among the children of Denmark Vesey was a boy by a Mandingo slave-woman, who was his father’s particular favourite. The Mandingos are one of the finest of African tribes, distinguished for intelligence, beauty of form, and an indomitable pride and energy of nature. As slaves, they are considered as particularly valuable by those who have tact enough to govern them, because of their great capability and their proud faithfulness; but they resent a government of brute force, and under such are always fractious and dangerous. This boy received from his mother the name of Dred; a name not unusual among the slaves, and generally given to those of great physical force. The development of this child's mind was so uncommon as to excite astonishment among the negroes. He early acquired the power of reading, by an apparent instinctive faculty, and would often astonish those around him with things which he had discovered in books. Like other children of a deep and fervent nature, he developed great religious ardour, and often surprised the elder negroes by his questions and replies on this subject. A son so endowed could not but be an object of great pride and interest to a father like Denmark Vesey. The impression seemed to prevail universally among the negroes that this child was born for extraordinary things; and perhaps it was the yearning to acquire liberty for the development of such a mind which first led Denmark Vesey to reflect on the nature of slavery, and the terrible weights which it lays on the human intellect, and to conceive the project of liberating a race. The Bible, of which Vesey was an incessant reader, stimulated this desire. He likened his own position of comparative education, competence, and general esteem among the whites, to that of Moses among the Egyptians; and nourished the idea that, like Moses, he was sent as a deliverer. During the process of the conspiracy, this son, though but ten years of age, was his father's confidant; and he often charged him, though he should fail in the attempt, never to be discouraged. He impressed it upon his mind that he should never submit tamely to the yoke of slavery; and nourished the idea already impressed, that some more than ordinary destiny was reserved for him.

After the discovery of the plot, and the execution of its leaders, those more immediately connected with them were sold from the state; even though not proved to have participated. With the most guarded caution, Vesey had exempted this son from suspicion. It had been an agreed policy with them both, that in the presence of others they should counterfeit alienation and dislike. Their confidential meetings with each other had been stolen and secret. At the time of his father's execution, Dred was a lad of fourteen. He could not be admitted to his father's prison, but he was a witness of the undaunted aspect with which he and the other conspirators met their doom. The memory dropped into the depths of his soul, as a stone drops into the desolate depths of a dark mountain lake. Sold to a distant plantation, he became noted for his desperate unsubduable disposition. He joined in none of the social recreations and amusements of the slaves, laboured with proud and silent assiduity, but, on the slightest rebuke or threat, flashed up with a savage fierceness, which, supported by his immense bodily strength, made him an object of dread among overseers. He was one of those of whom they gladly rid themselves; and, like a fractious horse, was sold from master to master. Finally, an overseer, hardier than the rest, determined on the task of subduing him. In the scuffle that ensued Dred struck him to the earth, a dead man, made his escape to the swamps, and was never afterwards heard of in civilized life.

The reader who consults the map will discover that the whole eastern shore of the southern states, with slight interruptions, is belted by an immense chain of swamps, regions of hopeless disorder, where the abundant growth and vegetation of nature, sucking up its forces from the humid soil, seems to rejoice in a savage exuberance, and bid defiance to all human efforts either to penetrate or subdue. These wild regions are the homes of the alligator, the mocassin, and the rattle-snake. Evergreen trees, mingling freely with the deciduous children of the forest, form here dense jungles, verdant all the year round, and which afford shelter to numberless birds, with whose warbling the leafy desolation perpetually resounds. Climbing vines, and parasitic plants, of untold splendour and boundless exuberance of growth, twine and interlace and hang, from the heights of the highest trees, pennons of gold and purple—triumphant banners which attest the solitary majesty of nature. A species of parasitic moss wreaths its abundant draperies from tree to tree, and hangs in pearly festoons, through which shine the scarlet berry and green leaves of the American holly. What the mountains of Switzerland were to the persecuted Vaudois, this swampy belt has been to the American slave. The constant effort to recover from thence fugitives has led to the adoption, in these states, of a separate profession, unknown at this time in any other Christian land—hunters, who train and keep dogs for the hunting of men, women, and children. And yet, with all the convenience of this profession, the reclaiming of the fugitives from these fastnesses of nature has been a work of such expense and difficulty, that the near proximity of the swamp has always been a considerable check on the otherwise absolute power of the overseer.

Dred carried with him to the swamp but one solitary companion—the Bible of his father. To him it was not the messenger of peace and good-will, but the herald of woe and wrath. As the mind, looking on the great volume of nature, sees there a reflection of its own internal passions, and seizes on that in it which sympathises with itself—as the fierce and savage soul delights in the roar of torrents, the thunder of avalanches, and the whirl of ocean storms, so is it in the great answering volume of revelation. There is something there for every phase of man's nature; and hence its endless vitality and stimulating force. Dred had heard read in the secret meetings of conspirators, the wrathful denunciations of ancient prophets against oppression and injustice. He had read of kingdoms convulsed by plagues; of tempest, and pestilence, and locusts; of the sea cleft in twain, that an army of slaves might pass through, and of their pursuers whelmed in the returning waters. He had heard of prophets and deliverers, armed with supernatural powers, raised up for oppressed people; had pondered on the nail of Jael, the goad of Shamgar, the pitcher and lamp of Gideon; and thrilled with fierce joy as he read how Samson, with his two strong arms, pulled down the pillars of the festive temple, and whelmed his triumphant persecutors in one grave with himself. In the vast solitudes which he daily traversed, these things entered deep into his soul.

Cut off from all human companionship, often going weeks without seeing a human face, there was no recurrence of every-day and prosaic ideas to check the current of the enthusiasm thus kindled. Even in the soil of the cool Saxon heart the Bible has thrown out its roots with an all-pervading energy, so that the whole framework of society may be said to rest on soil held together by its fibres. Even in cold and misty England armies have been made defiant and invincible by the incomparable force and deliberate valour which it breathes into men. But when this oriental seed, an exotic among us, is planted back in the fiery soil of a tropical heart, it bursts forth with an incalculable ardour of growth.

A stranger cannot fail to remark the fact, that though the slaves of the south are unable to read the Bible for themselves, yet most completely have its language and sentiment penetrated among them, giving a Hebraistic colouring to their habitual mode of expression. How much greater, then, must have been the force of the solitary perusal of this volume on so impassioned a nature! a nature, too, kindled by memories of the self-sacrificing ardour with which a father and his associates had met death at the call of freedom; for none of us may deny that, wild and hopeless as this scheme was, it was still the same in kind with the more successful one which purchased for our fathers a national existence.

A mind of the most passionate energy and vehemence, thus awakened, for years made the wild solitudes of the swamp his home. That book, so full of startling symbols and vague images, had for him no interpreter but the silent courses of nature. His life passed in a kind of dream: sometimes traversing for weeks these desolate regions, he would compare himself to Elijah, traversing for forty days and forty nights the wilderness of Horeb; or to John the Baptist in the wilderness, girding himself with camels' hair and eating locusts and wild honey. Sometimes he would fast and pray for days, and then voices would seem to speak to him, and strange hieroglyphics would be written upon the leaves. In less elevated moods of mind, he would pursue, with great judgment and vigour, those enterprises necessary to preserve existence.

The negroes lying out in the swamp are not so wholly cut off from society as might at first be imagined. The slaves of all the adjoining plantations, whatever they may pretend, to secure the good-will of their owners, are at heart secretly disposed, from motives both of compassion and policy, to favour the fugitives. They very readily perceive that, in the event of any difficulty occurring to themselves, it might be quite necessary to have a friend and protector in the swamp; and therefore they do not hesitate to supply those fugitives, so far as they are able, with anything which they may desire. The poor whites, also, who keep small shops in the neighbourhood of plantations, are never particularly scrupulous, provided they can turn a penny to their own advantage, and willingly supply necessary wares in exchange for game, with which the swamp abounds. Dred, therefore, came in possession of an excellent rifle, and never wanted for ammunition, which supplied him with an abundance of food. Besides this, there are, here and there, elevated spots in the swampy land, which by judicious culture are capable of great productiveness; and many such spots Dred had brought under cultivation, either with his own hands or from those of other fugitives, whom he had received and protected. From the restlessness of his nature, he had not confined himself to any particular region, but had traversed the whole swampy belt of both the Carolinas, as well as that of Southern Virginia; residing a few months in one place and a few months in another. Wherever he stopped he formed a sort of retreat, where he received and harboured fugitives. On one occasion he rescued a trembling and bleeding mulatto woman from the dogs of the hunters, who had pursued her into the swamp. This woman he made his wife, and appeared to entertain a very deep affection for her. He made a retreat for her, with more than common ingenuity, in the swamp adjoining the Gordon plantation; and after that he was more especially known in that locality. He had fixed his eye upon Harry, as a person whose ability, address, and strength of character might make him at some day a leader in a conspiracy against the whites. Harry, in common with many of the slaves on the Gordon plantation, knew perfectly well of the presence of Dred in the neighbourhood, and had often seen and conversed with him. But neither he nor any of the rest of them ever betrayed before any white person the slightest knowledge of the fact. This ability of profound secrecy is one of the invariable attendants of a life of slavery. Harry was acute enough to know that his position was by no means so secure that he could afford to dispense with anything which might prove an assistance in some future emergency. The low white traders in the neighbourhood also knew Dred well; but as long as they could drive an advantageous trade with him, he was secure from their intervention. So secure had he been, that he had been even known to mingle in the motley throng of a camp-meeting unmolested.

This much with regard to one who is to appear often on the stage before our history is done.

CHAPTER XX.

SUMMER TALK AT CANEMA.

IN the course of a few days the family circle at Canema was enlarged by the arrival of Clayton's sister; and Carson, in excellent spirits, had started for a northern watering-place. In answer to Nina's letter of invitation, Anne had come with her father, who was called to that vicinity by the duties of his profession. Nina received her with her usual gay frankness of manner; and Anne, like many others, soon found herself liking her future sister much better than she had expected. Perhaps, had Nina been in any other situation than that of hostess, her pride might have led her to decline making the agreeable to Anne, whom, notwithstanding, she very much wished to please. But she was mistress of the mansion, and had an Arab's idea of the privileges of a guest; and so she chatted, sung, and played for her. She took her about, showed her the walks, the arbors, the flower-garden; waited on her in her own apartment, with a thousand little attentions, all the more fascinating from the kind of careless independence with which they were rendered. Besides, Nina had vowed a wicked little vow in her heart that she would ride rough-shod over Anne's dignity; that she wouldn't let her be grave or sensible; but that she should laugh and frolic with her; and Clayton could scarce help smiling at the success that soon crowned her exertions. Nina's gaiety, when in full tide, had a breezy infectiousness in it that seemed to stir up every one about her, and carry them on the tide of her own spirits; and Anne, in her company, soon found herself laughing at everything and nothing, simply because she felt gay. To crown all, uncle John Gordon arrived, with his cheery, jovial face; and he was one of those fearless hit-or-miss talkers that are invaluable in social dilemmas, because they keep something or other all the while in motion. With him came Madam Gordon, or, as Nina commonly called her, aunt Maria. She was a portly, fine-formed, middle-aged woman, who might have been handsome had not the lines of care and nervous anxiety ploughed themselves so deeply in her face. Her bright, keen, hazel eyes, fine teeth, and the breadth of her ample form, attested the vitality of the old Virginian stock from whence she sprung.

'There,' said Nina to Anne Clayton, as they sat in the shady side of the veranda, 'I've marshalled aunt Maria up into aunt Nesbit's room, and there they will have a comfortable dish of lamentation over me.'

'Over you?' said Anne.

'Yes, over me to be sure!—that's the usual order of exercises. Such a setting down as I shall get! They'll count up on their fingers all the things I ought to know and don't, and ought to do and can't. I believe that's the way relatives always show their affection—~~aunts~~ in particular—by mourning over you.'

'And what sort of a list will they make out?' said Anne.

'O, bless me, that's easy enough. Why, there's aunt Maria is a perfect virulent housekeeper—really insane, I believe, on that subject. Why, she chases up every rat and mouse and cockroach, every particle of dust, every scrap of litter. She divides her hours and is as punctual as a clock. She rules her household with a rod of iron, and makes everybody stand round; and tells each one how many times a day she may wink. She keeps accounts like a very dragon, and always is sure to pounce on anybody that is in the least out of the way. She cuts out clothes by the bale; she sews, and she knits, and she jingles keys. And all this kind of bustle she calls housekeeping! Now, what do you suppose she must think of me, who just put on my hat in the morning, and go sailing down the walks, looking at the flowers, till aunt Katy calls me back, to know what my orders are for the day?

‘Pray, who is aunt Katy?’ said Anne.

‘O, she is my female prime minister; and she is very much like some prime ministers I have studied about in history, who always contrive to have their own way, let what will come. Now, when aunt Katy comes and wants to know, so respectfully, “What Miss Nina is going to have for dinner,” do you suppose that she has the least expectation of getting anything I order? She always has fifty objections to anything that I propose. For sometimes the fit comes over me to try to be housekeepy, like aunt Maria; but it’s no go, I can tell you. So, when she has proved that everything that I propose is the height of absurdity, and shown conclusively that there’s nothing fit to be eaten in the neighbourhood, by that time I am reduced to a proper state of mind. And, when I humbly say, “Aunt Katy, what shall we do?” then she gives a little cough, and out comes the whole programme, just as she had arranged it the night before. And so it goes. As to accounts, why, Harry has to look after them. I detest everything about money, except the spending of it. I have rather a talent for that. Now, just think how awfully all this must impress poor aunt Maria! what sighings and rolling up of eyes, and shaking of heads, there are over me! And, then, aunt Nesbit is always dinging at me about improving my mind! And improving my mind means reading some horrid, stupid, boring old book, just as she does! Now, I like the idea of improving my mind. I am sure it wants improving bad enough; but, then, I can’t help thinking that racing through the garden, and cantering through the woods, improves it faster than getting asleep over books. It seems to me that books are just like dry hay—very good when there isn’t any fresh grass to be had. But I’d rather be out and eat what’s growing. Now what people call nature never bores me: but almost every book I ever saw does. Don't you think people are made differently? Some like books, and some like things; don't you think so?

'I can give you a good fact on your side of the argument,' said Clayton, who had come up behind them during the conversation.

'I didn't know I was arguing; but I shall be glad to have anything on my side,' said Nina, 'of course.'

'Well, then,' said Clayton, 'I'll say that the books that have influenced the world the longest, the widest, and deepest, have been written by men who attended to things more than to books; who, as you say, eat what was growing, instead of dry hay. Homer couldn't have had much to read in his time, nor the poets of the Bible; and they have been fountains for all ages. I don't believe Shakspeare was much of a reader.'

'Well, but,' said Anne, 'don't you think that, for us common folks, who are not going to be either Homers or Shaksperes, that it's best to have two strings to our bow, and to gain instruction both from books and things?'

'To be sure,' said Clayton, 'if we only use books aright. With many people, reading is only a form of mental indolence, by which they escape the labour of thinking for themselves. Some persons are like Pharaoh's lean kine; they swallow book upon book, but remain as lean as ever.'

'My grandfather used to say,' said Anne, 'that the Bible and Shakspeare were enough for a woman's library.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I don't like Shakspeare. There! I'm coming out flat with it. In the first place, I don't understand half he says; and then they talk about his being so very natural! I'm sure I never heard people talk as he makes them. Now, did you ever hear people talk in blank verse, with every now and then, one or two lines of rhyme, as his characters do when they go off in long speeches. Now, did you?'

'As to that,' said Clayton, 'it's about half and half. His conversations have just about the same resemblance to real life that acting at the opera has. It is not natural for Norma to burst into a song when she discovers the treachery of her husband. You make that concession to the nature of the opera, in the first place; and then, with that reserve, all the rest strikes you as natural, and the music gives an added charm to it. So, in Shakspeare, you concede that the plays are to be poems, and that the people are to talk in rhythm, and with all the exaltation of poetic sentiment; and, that being admitted, their conversations may seem natural.'

'But I can't understand a great deal that Shakspeare says,' said Nina.

'Because so many words and uses are altered since he wrote,' said Clayton. 'Because there are so many allusions to incidents that have passed, and customs that have perished, that you have, as it were, to acquire his language before you can understand him. Suppose a poem were written in a foreign tongue; you couldn't say whether you liked it or disliked it, till you could read the language. Now, my opinion is, that there is a liking for Shakspeare hidden in your nature, like a seed that has not sprouted.'

'What makes you think so?'

'O, I see it in you, just as a sculptor sees a statue in a block of marble.'

'And are you going to chisel it out?' said Nina.

'With your leave,' said Clayton. 'After all, I like your sincerity in saying what you do think. I have often heard ladies profess an admiration for Shakspeare that I knew couldn't be real. I knew that they had neither the experience of life, nor the insight into human nature, really to appreciate what is in him; and that their liking for him was all a worked-up affair, because they felt it would be very shocking not to like him.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I'm much obliged to you for all the sense you find in my nonsense. I believe I shall keep you to translate my fooleries into good English.'

'You know I'm quite at your disposal,' said Clayton, 'for that or anything else.'

At this moment the attention of Nina was attracted by loud exclamations from that side of the house where the negro cottages were situated.

'Get along off! don't want none o' yo old trash here! No, no, Miss Nina don't want none o' yo old fish. She's got plenty of figgers to ketch her own fish.'

'Somebody taking my name in vain in those regions,' said Nina, running to the other end of the veranda. 'Tomtit,' she said to that young worthy, who lay flat on his back, licking up his heels in the sun, waiting for his knives to clean themselves, 'pray tell me what's going on there?'

'Laws, missis,' said Tom, 'it's just one of dese yer poor white trash, coming round here trying to sell one thing o'nother. Miss Loo says it won't do courage 'em, and I's de same 'pinion.'

'Send him round here to me,' said Nina, who partly from humanity, and partly from a spirit of contradiction, had determined to take up for the poor white folks, on all occasions. Tomtit ran accordingly, and soon brought to the verandah a man, whose wretchedly tattered clothing scarcely formed a decent covering. His cheeks were sunken and hollow, and he stood before Nina with a cringing, half-ashamed attitude; and yet one might see that, with better dress and better keeping, he might be made to assume the appearance of a handsome, intelligent man.

'What do you ask for your fish?' she said to him.

'Anything ye pleases!'

'Where do you live?' said Nina, drawing out her purse.

'My folk's staying on Mr. Gordon's place.'

'Why don't you get a place of your own to stay on?' said Nina.

There was an impatient glance flashed from the man's eye, but it gave place immediately to his habitual cowed expression, as he said,

'Can't get work—can't get money—can't get nothing.'

'Dear me,' said her uncle John, who had been standing for a moment listening to the conversation. 'This must be husband of that poor hobgoblin that has lighted down on my place lately. Well you may as well pay him a good price for his fish. Keeping them from starving one day longer, may be.' And Nina paid the man a liberal sum, and dismissed him.

'I suppose, now, all my eloquence wouldn't make Rose cook those fish for dinner,' said Nina.

'Why not, if you told her to?' said aunt Maria, who had already descended to the verandah.

'Why not?—Just because, as she would say, she hadn't laid out to do it.'

'That's not the way my servants are taught to do!' said aunt Maria.

'I'll warrant not,' said Nina. 'But yours and mine are quite different affairs, aunt. They all do as they have a mind to, in my diggings. All I stipulate for is a little of the same privilege.'

'That man's wife and children have come and "squatted" down on my place,' said Mr. Gordon, laughing; 'and so, Nina, all you paid for his fish is just so much saving to me.'

'Yes, to be sure! Mr. Gordon is just one of those men that will have a tribe of shiftless hangers-on at his heels!' said Mrs. Gordon.

'Well, bless my soul! What's a fellow to do? Can't see the poor heathen starve, can we? If society could only be organized over, now, there would be hope for them. The brain ought to control the hands; but among us the hands try to set up for themselves;—and see what comes of it!'

'Who do you mean by brain?' said Nina.

'Who? why, we upper crust, to be sure! We educated people! We ought to have an absolute sway over the working classes, just as the brain rules the hand. It must come to that at last—no other arrangement is possible. The white working classes can't take care of themselves, and must be put into a condition for us to take care of them. What is liberty to them?—Only a name—liberty to be hungry and naked, that's all. It's the strangest thing in the world, how people stick to names! I suppose that fellow up there would flare up terribly at being put in with my niggers; and yet he and his children are glad of the crumbs that fall from their table! It's astonishing to me how, with such examples before them, any decent man can be so stone blind as to run a-tilt against slavery. Just compare the free working classes with our slaves! Dear me! the blindness of people in this world! It's too much for my patience, particularly in hot weather!' said Mr. John, wiping his face with a white pocket handkerchief.

'Well, but uncle John,' said Nina, 'my dear old gentleman, you haven't travelled, as I have.'

'No, child! I thank the Lord I never stepped my foot out of a slave state, and I never mean to,' said uncle John.

'But you ought to see the northern working people,' said Nina. 'Why, the governors of the states are farmers, sometimes, and work with their own men. The brain and the hand go together, in each one—not one great brain to fifty pair of hands. And, I tell you, work is done up there very differently from what's done here! Just look at our ploughs and our hoes! the most ridiculous things that I ever saw. I should think one of them would weigh ten pounds!'

'Well, if you don't have 'em heavy enough to go into the ground by their own weight these cursed lazy nigs wouldn't do anything with them. They'd break a dozen Yankee hoes in a forenoon,' said uncle John.

'Now,' said Nina, 'uncle John, you dear old heathen, you! do let me tell you a little how it is there. I went up into New Hampshire, once, with Livy Ray, to spend a vacation. Livy's father is a farmer ; works part of every day with his own men ; hoes, digs, plants ; but he is governor of the state. He has a splendid farm—all in first-rate order ; and his sons, with two or three hired men, keep it in better condition than our places ever saw. Mr. Ray is a man who reads a great deal ; has a fine library, and he's as much of a gentleman as you'll often see. There are no high and low classes there. Everybody works ; and everybody seems to have a good time. Livy's mother has a beautiful dairy, spring house, and two strong women to help her ; and everything in the house looks beautifully ; and, for the greater part of the day, the house seems so neat and still, you wouldn't know anything had been done in it. Seems to me this is better than making slaves of all the working classes, or having any working classes at all.'

'How wise young ladies always are!' said uncle John. 'Undoubtedly the millennium is begun in New Hampshire! But, pray, my dear, what part do young ladies take in all this? Seems to me, Nin, you haven't picked up much of this improvement in person.'

'O, as to that, I labour in my vocation,' said Nina ; 'that is, of enlightening dull, sleepy old gentlemen, who never travelled out of the state they were born in, and don't know what can be done. I come as a missionary to them ; I'm sure that's work enough for one.'

'Well,' said aunt Maria, 'I know I am as great a slave as any of the poor whites, or negroes, either. There isn't a soul in my whole troop that pretends to take any care, except me, either about themselves or their children, or anything else.'

'I hope that isn't a slant at me!' said Uncle John, shrugging his shoulders.

'I must say you are as bad as any of them,' said aunt Maria.

'There it goes!—now I'm getting it!' said uncle John. 'I declare, the next time we get a preacher out here, I'm going to make him hold forth on the duties of wives!'

'And husbands, too!' said aunt Maria.

'Do,' said Nina. 'I should like a little prospective information.'

Nina, as often, spoke before she thought. Uncle John gave a malicious look at Clayton. Nina could not recall the words. She coloured deeply, and went on hastily to change the subject. 'At any rate, I know that aunt here has a much harder time than housekeepers do in the free states. Just the shoes she wears out chasing up her negroes would hire help enough to do all her work. They used to have an idea, up there, that all the southern ladies did was to lie on the sofa ; I used to tell them it was as much as they knew about it.'

'Your cares don't seem to have worn you much !' said uncle John.

'Well, they will, uncle John, if you don't behave better. It's enough to break anybody down to keep you in order.'

'I wish,' said uncle John, shrugging up his shoulders, and looking quizzically at Clayton, 'somebody would take warning.'

'For my part,' said aunt Maria, 'I know one thing. I'd be glad to get rid of my negroes. Sometimes I think life is such a burden that I don't think it's worth having.'

'Oh, no, you don't, mother,' said uncle John ; 'not with such a charming husband as you've got, who relieves you from all care so perfectly.'

'I declare,' said Nina, looking along the avenue, 'what's that ? Why, if there isn't old Tiff coming along with his children !'

'Who is he ?' said aunt Maria.

'Oh, he belongs to one of those miserable families,' said aunt Nesbit, 'that have squatted in the pine-woods somewhere about here—a poor worthless set ; but Nina has a great idea of patronizing them.'

'Clear Gordon, every inch of her !' said aunt Maria, as Nina ran down to meet Tiff. 'Just like her uncle.'

'Come, now, old lady, I'll tell of you if you don't take care,' said Mr. Gordon. 'Didn't I find you putting up a basket of provisions for those folks you scolded me so for taking in ?'

'Scold, Mr. Gordon ! I never scold !'

'I beg pardon—that you reproved me for.'

Ladies generally are not displeased for being reproached for their charities ; and aunt Maria, whose bark, to use a vulgar proverb, was infinitely worse than her bite, sat fanning herself with an air of self-complacency. Meanwhile Nina had run down the avenue, and was busy in a confidential communication with Tiff. On her return, she came skipping up the steps, apparently in high glee.

'Oh, uncle John, there's the greatest fun getting up ! You must all go, certainly. What do you think ? Tiff says there's to be a camp-meeting in the neighbourhood, only about five miles off from this place. Let's make up a party, and all go.'

'That's the time of day,' said uncle John. 'I enrol myself under your banner at once. I am open to improvement. Anybody wants to convert me, here I am.'

'The trouble with you, uncle John,' said Nina, 'is that you don't stay converted. You are just like one of these heavy fishes—you bite very sharp, but, before anybody can get you fairly on to the bank, you are flapping and floundering back into the water, and down you go into your sins again. I know at least three ministers who thought they had hooked you out; but they were mistaken.'

'For my part,' said aunt Maria, 'I think these camp-meetings do more harm than good. They collect all the scum and riff-raff of the community, and I believe there's more drinking done at camp-meetings in one week than is done in six anywhere else. Then, of course, all the hands will want to be off; and Mr. Gordon has brought them up so that they feel dreadfully abused if they are not in with everything that's going on. I shall set down my foot this year, that they shan't go any day except Sunday.'

'My wife knows that she was always celebrated for having the handsomest foot in the county, and so she is always setting it down at me,' said Mr. Gordon, 'for she knows that a pretty foot is irresistible with me.'

'Mr. Gordon, how can you talk so? I should think that you'd got old enough not to make such silly speeches,' said aunt Maria.

'Silly speeches! It's a solemn fact, and you won't hear anything truer at the camp-meeting,' said uncle John. 'But come, Clayton, will you go? My dear fellow, your grave face will be an appropriate ornament to the scene, I can assure you; and as to Miss Anne, it wou't do for an old fellow like me, in this presence, to say what a happiness it would be.'

'I suspect,' said Anne, 'Edward is afraid he may be called on for some of the services. People are always taking him for a clergyman, and asking him to say grace at meals, and to conduct family prayers, when he is travelling among strangers.'

'It's a comment on our religion that these should be thought peculiar offices of clergymen,' said Clayton. 'Every Christian man ought to be ready and willing to take them.'

'I honour that sentiment,' said uncle John. 'A man ought not to be ashamed of his religion anywhere no more than a soldier of his colours. I believe there's more religion hid in the hearts of honest laymen, now, than is plastered up behind the white cravats of clergymen; and they ought to come out with it. Not that I have any disrespect for the clergy, either,' said uncle John. 'Fine men—a little stiffish, and don't call things by good English names. Always talking about dispensation, and sanctification, and edification, and so forth; but I like them. They are sincere. I suppose they wouldn't any of them give me a chance for heaven, because I rip out with an oath every now and then. But the fact is, what with niggers, and overseers, and white trash, my chances of salvation are dreadfully limited. I can't help swearing now and then if I was to die for it. They say it's dreadfully wicked; but I feel more Christian when I let out than when I keep in.'

'Mr. Gordon,' said aunt Marian, reprovingly, 'do consider what you're saying.'

'My dear, I am considering. I'm considering all the time. I never do anything else but consider, except, as I said before, every now and then, when What's-his-name gets the advantage over me. And hark you, Mrs. G., let's have things ready at our house if any of the clergy would like to spend a week or so with us; and we could get them up some meetings, or any little thing in their line. I always like to show respect for them.'

'Our beds are always prepared for company, Mr. Gordon,' said aunt Maria, with a stately air.

'Oh, yes, yes, I don't doubt that. I only meant some special preparation—some little fatted-calf-killing, and so on.'

'Now,' said Nina, 'shall we set off to-morrow morning?'

'Agreed!' said uncle John.

CHAPTER XXI.

TIFF'S PREPARATION.

THE announcement of the expected camp-meeting produced a vast sensation at Canaan, in other circles besides the hall. In the servants' department, everybody was full of the matter, from aunt Katy down to Tomtit. The women were thinking over their available finery; for these gatherings furnish the negroes with the same opportunity for display that Grace Church does to the Broadway belles. And so, before old Tiff, who had brought the first intelligence to the plantation, had time to depart, Tomtit had trumpeted the news through all the cluster of negro houses that skirted the right side of the mansion, proclaiming that 'dere was going to be a camp-meeting, and tip-top work of grace, and Miss Nina was going to let all de niggers go.' Old Tiff, therefore, found himself in a prominent position in a group of negro-women, among whom Rose, the cook, was conspicuous.

'Law, Tiff, ye gwine? and gwine to take your chil'en? ha! ha! ha!' said she. 'Why, Miss Fanny dey'll tink Tiff's yer mammy! Ho! ho! ho!'

'Yah! yah! Ho! ho! ho!' roared in a chorus of laughter on all sides, doing honour to aunt Rose's wit; and Tomtit who hung upon the skirts of the crowd, threw up the fragment of a hat in the air and kicked it in an abandon of joy, regardless of the neglected dinner-knives. Old Tiff, mindful of dignities, never failed to propitiate Rose, on his advent to the plantation, with the gift which the 'wise man saith maketh friends;' and, on the present occasion, he had enriched her own peculiar stock of domestic fowl by the present of a pair of young partridge chicks, a nest of which he had just captured, intending to bring them up by hand as he did his children. By this discreet course, Tiff stood high where it was of most vital consequence that he should so stand; and many a choice morsel did Rose cook for him in accret, besides imparting to him most invaluable recipes on the culture and raising of sucking babes.

Old Hundred, like many other persons, felt that general attention lavished on any other celebrity was so much taken from his own merits, and, therefore, on the present occasion, sat regarding Tiff's evident popularity with a cynical eye. At last, coming up, like a wicked fellow as he was, he launched his javelin at old Tiff, by observing to his wife, 'I's 'stonished at you, Rose! You cook to de Gordons, and making yourself so cheap—so familiar with de poor white folk's niggers!'

Had the slant fallen upon himself, personally, old Tiff would probably have given a jolly crow, and laughed as heartily as he generally did if he happened to be caught out in a rain-storm; but the reflection on his family connection tried him up like a torch, and his eyes flashed through his big spectacles like firelight through windows.

'You go 'long, talking 'bout what you don't know nothing 'bout! I like to know what you knows 'bout de old Virginy families? Dem's de real old stock! You Car'line folks come from dem, stick and stock, every blest one of you! De Gordons is a nice family—an't nothing to say agin de Gordons—but whai was you raised, dat ye didn't hear 'bout de Peytons? Why, old Gen'ral Peyton didn't he use to ride with six black horses afore him, as if he'd been a king? Dere wan't one of dem horses dat hadn't a tail as long as my arm. You never see no such critters in your life!

'I han't, han't I?' said Old Hundred, now in his turn touched in a vital point. 'Bless me, if I han't seen de Gordons riding out with der eight horses, any time o' day!'

'Come, come, now, dere wasn't so many,' said Rose, who had her own reasons for staying on Tiff's side. 'Nobody never rode with eight horses!'

'Did too! You say much more, I'll make sixteen on 'em. Fore my blessed Master, how dese yer old niggers will lie! Dey's always zaggerating der families. Makes de very har rise on my head, to hear dese yer old niggers talk; dey lie so!' said Old Hundred.

'You tink folks dat take to lying is using up your business, don't ye?' said Tiff. 'But, I tell you, any one dat says a word agin de Peytons got me to set in with!'

'Laws, dem chil'en an't Peytons!' said Old Hundred; 'deys' Crippses; and I like to know who ever hearn of de Crippses? Go way! don't tell me nothing about dem Crippses! Dey's poor white folks! A body may see dat sticking out all over 'em.'

'You shut up!' said Tiff. 'I don't b'lieve you was born on de Gordon place, 'cause you an't got no manners. I 'spects you some old, second-hand nigger, Colonel Gordon must a took for debt, some time, from some of dese yer mean Tennessee families, dat don know how to keep der money when dey gets it. Dese niggers is allers de meanest kind. Cause all de real Gordon niggers is ladies and gen'lemen—every one of em,' said old Tiff, like a true orator, bent on carrying his audience along with him.

A general shout chorused this compliment; and Tiff, under cover of the applause, shook up his reins, and rode off in triumph.

'Dar, now, you aggravating old nigger,' said Rose, turning to her bosom lord, 'I hope yer got it now! De plaguest old nigger dat ever I see! And you, Tom, go 'long and clean your knives, if yer don't mean to be cracked over.'

Meanwhile Tiff, restored to his usual tranquillity, ambled along homewards behind his one-eyed horse, singing—

'I'm bound for the land of Canaan,' with some surprising variations. At last Miss Fanny, as he constantly called her, interposed with a very pregnant question:—

'Uncle Tiff, where is the land of Canaan?'

'De Lord-a-mercy, chile, dat ar's what I'd like to know myself.'

'Is it heaven?' said Fanny.

'Well, I reckon so,' said Tiff, dubiously.

'Is it where ma is gone?' said Fanny.

'Chile, I reckon it is,' said Tiff.

'Is it down under ground?' said Fanny.

'Why, no; ho! ho! honey!' said Tiff, laughing heartily.

'What put dat ar in your head, Miss Fanny?'

'Didn't ma, go that way?' said Fanny; 'down through the ground?'

'Lordy, no, chile! Heaven's up!' said Tiff, pointing up to the intense blue sky, which appeared through the fringy hollows of the pine-trees above them.

'Is there any stairs anywhere? or any ladder to get up by?' said Fanny; 'or do they walk to where the sky touches the ground, and get up? Perhaps they climb up on the rainbow?'

'I don' know, chile, how dey works it,' said uncle Tiff. 'Dey gets dar somehow. I's studdin upon dat ar. I's gwine to camp-meeting to find out. I's been to plenty of dem ar, and I never could quite see clar. 'Pears like dey talks about everthing else more'n dey does about dat. Dere's de Methodists, dey cuts up de Presbyterans; and de Presbyterans pitches into de Methodists; and den both on 'em's down on de 'Piscopals. My ole mist' was 'Piscopal, and I never seed no harm in't. And de Baptists think dey an't none on 'em right; and, while dey's all a-blowing out at each other dat ar way, I's a wondering whar's de way to Canaan. It takes a mighty heap o' larning to know about dese yer things, and I an't got no larning. I don't know nothing, only de Lord; he 'peared to your ma, and he knows de way, and he took her. But, now, chile, I's gwine to fix you up right smart, and take you, Teddy and de baby, to dis yer camp-meeting, so you can seek de Lord in yer youth.'

'Tiff, if you please, I'd rather not go,' said Fanny, in an apprehensive tone.

'O, bless de Lord, Miss Fanny, why not? First-rate times dere.'

'There'll be too many people. I don't want them to see us.'

The fact was, that Rose's slant speech about Tiff's maternal relationship, united with the sneers of Old Hundred, had their effect upon Fanny's mind. Naturally proud, and fearful of ridicule, she shrank from the public display which would thus be made of their family condition; yet she would not for the world have betrayed to her kind old friend the real reason of her hesitation. But old Tiff's keen eye had noted the expression of the child's countenance at the time. If anybody supposes that the faithful old creature's heart was at all wounded by the perception, they are greatly mistaken. To Tiff it appeared a joke of the very richest quality; and as he rode along in silence for some time, he indulged himself in one of his quiet long laughs, actually shaking his old sides till the tears streamed down his cheeks.

'What is the matter with you, Tiff?' said Fanny.

'O, Miss Fanny, Tiff knows! Tiff knows de reason you don't want to go to camp-meeting; Tiff's seen it in yer face—ye ho! ho! ho! Miss Fanny, is you 'fraid dey'll take old Tiff for yer manmy? ye ho! ho! ho!—for yer manmy? and Teddy's and de baby's? bless his little soul!' And the amphibious old creature rollicked over the idea with infinite merriment. 'Don't I look like it, Miss Fanny? Lord, ye poor dear lamb, can't folks see ye's a born lady, with yer white little hands? Don't ye be 'feared, Miss Fanny.'

'I know it's silly,' said Fanny; 'but, besides, I don't like to be called poor white folksy!'

'O, chile! it's only dem mean niggers! Miss Nina's allers good to ye, an't she? speaks to ye so handsome! Ye must memorize dat ar, Miss Fanny, and talk like Miss Nina. I's 'feard, now yer ma's dead, ye'll fall into some o' my nigger ways of talking. 'Member you mustn't talk like old Tiff; 'cause young ladies and gen'lmen mustn't talk like niggers. Now I says dis and dat, dis yer and dat ar; dat ar ~~is~~ nigger talk and por white folksy too. Only de por white folks, dey's mis'able, 'cause niggers knows what's good talk, but dey doesn't. Lord, chile, old Tiff knows what good talk is. An't he heard de greatest ladies and gen'lmen in de land talk? But he don't want de trouble to talk dat ar way, 'cause he's a nigger. Tiff likes his own talk—it's good enough for Tiff. Tiff's talk sarves him mighty well, I tell yer. But, den, white children mustn't talk so. Now, you see, Miss Nina has got de prettiest way of saying her words. Dey drops out one after another, one after another, so pretty! Now you ~~mind~~, 'cause she's coming to see us off and on—she promised so. And den you keep a good look-out how she walks, and how she holds her pocket-handkerchief. And when she sits down she kind o' gives a little flirt to her clothes, so dey all set round her like ruffles. Dese yer little ways ladies have. Why, dese yer por white folks—did yer ever mind der settin' down? Why dey jist slaps down into a chair like a spoonful o' mush, and der clothes all stick tight about 'em. I don't want nothing poor white folksy, 'bout you. Den, if you don't understand what people's a saying to you any time, you mustn't star, like por white chil'en, and say, What? but you must say, "I beg pardou, sir," or, "I beg pardon, ma'am." Dat ar's de way. And, Miss Fanny, you and Teddy, you must study yer book, 'cause if you can't read dem, dey'll be sure to say yer por white folks. And den, Miss Fanny, you see dat ladies don't demcan themselves with sweeping and scrubbing, and dem tings; and yet dey does work, honey! Dey sews and dey knits; and it would be good for you to larn how to sew and knit, 'cause, you know, I can't allers make up all de clothes, 'cause, you see, young ladies haves ways wid 'em dat niggers can't get. Now, you see, Miss Fanny, all dese yer tings I was telling you you must 'bserve. Now, you see, if you was one of dese yer por white folks, dere'd be no use of your trying, 'cause dat ar 'scription o' people couldn't never be lef if dey was waring themselves out a trying. But, you see, ~~you~~ not it in you; you was born to it, houe; it's in de blood, ~~and~~ dat's in de blood must come out. Ho! ho! ho! And with ~~his~~ final laugh Tiff drew up to his dwelling.

A busy day was before old Tiff, for he was to set his house in order for a week's campaign. There was his corn to be hoed, his parsley to be weeded, there was his orphan family of young partridges to be cared for: and Tiff, after some considerable consideration, resolved to take them along with him in a basket, thinking in the intervals of devotion he should have an abundant opportunity to minister to their wants and superintend their education. Then he went to one of his favourite springes, and brought from thence, not a fatted calf, to be sure, but a fatted coon, which he intended to take with him, to serve as the basis of a savoury stew on the camp-ground. Tiff had a thriving company of pot-herbs, and a flourishing young colony of onions, so that, whatever might be true of the sermons, it was evident that the stew would lack no savor. Teddy's clothes, also, were to be passed in review; washing and ironing to be done; the baby fitted up to do honour to his name, or rather to the name of his grandfather. With all these cares upon his mind, the old creature was even more than usually alert. The day was warm, and he resolved, therefore, to perform his washing operations in the magnificent kitchen of nature. He accordingly kindled a splendid-bonfire, which was soon crackling at a short distance from the house, slung over it his kettle, and proceeded to some other necessary avocations. The pine-wood, which had been imperfectly seasoned, served him the ungracious trick that pine-wood is apt to do; it crackled and roared merrily while he was present, but while he was down examining his traps in the woods, went entirely out, leaving only the blackened sticks.

'Uncle Tiff,' said Teddy, 'the fire is all gone out.'

'Ho! ho! ho! has it?' said Tiff, coming up. 'Curus enough. Well, bress de Lord, got all de wood left, any way; had a real bright fire, beside,' said Tiff, intent on upholding the sunniest side of things. 'Lor, it's de sun dat p'ts de fire out o' countenance. Did you ever see fire dat wouldn't go out when de sun's shining right in its face? Dat ar is a curus fact. I's minded it heaps o' times. Well, I'll just have to come out wid my light-wood kindlings, dat's all. Bress de Lord, ho! ho! ho!' said Tiff, laughing to himself, 'if dese yer an't de very sp'rit of de camp-meeting professors! Dey blazes away at de camp-meeting, and den dey's black all de year round! See 'em at de camp-meetings, you'd say dey war gwine right into de kingdom, sure enough! Well, Lord have marcy on us all! Our 'ligion's dressful poor stuff! We don't know but a despart lectle, and what we does know we don' do. De good Mas'r above must have his hands full with us!'

CHAPTER XXII.

THE WORSHIPPERS.

THE camp-meeting is one leading feature in the American development of religion peculiarly suited to the wide extent of country, and to the primitive habits which generally accompany a sparse population. Undoubtedly its general effects have been salutary. Its evils have been only those incident to any large gatherings, in which the whole population of a country are brought promiscuously together. As in many other large assemblies of worship, there are those who go for all sorts of reasons; some from curiosity, some from a love of excitement, some to turn a penny in a small way of trade, some to scoff, and a few to pray.

And so long as the heavenly way remains strait and narrow, so long the sincere and humble worshippers will ever be the minority in all assemblies. We can give no better idea of the difference of motive which impelled the various worshippers, than by taking our readers from scene to scene on the morning when different attendants of the meeting were making preparations to start.

Between the grounds of Mr. John Gordon and the plantation of Canema stood a log cabin, which was the trading establishment of Abijah Skinfint. The establishment was a nuisance in the eyes of the neighbouring planters, from the general apprehension entertained that Abijah drove a brisk underhand trade with the negroes, and that the various articles which he displayed for sale were many of them surreptitiously conveyed to him in nightly instalments from off their own plantations. But of this nothing could be proved. Abijah was a shrewd fellow, long, dry, lean, leathery, with sharp nose, sharp little grey eyes, a sharp chin, and fingers as long as birds' claws. His skin was so dry that one would have expected that his cheeks would crackle whenever he smiled or spoke; and he rolled in them a never-failing quid of tobacco. Abijah was one of those over-shrewd Yankees who leave their country for their country's good, and who exhibit, wherever they settle, such a caricature of the thrifty virtue of their native land as to justify the aversion which the native-born southerner entertains for the Yankee. Abijah drank his own whiskey, prudently however, or, as he said, 'never so as not to know what he was about.' He had taken a wife from the daughters of the land, who also drank whiskey, but less prudently than her husband, so that sometimes she did not know what she was about. Sons and daughters were born unto this promising couple, white-headed, forward, dirty, and ill-mannered. But amid all domestic and social trials, Abijah maintained a constant and steady devotion to the main chance—the acquisition of money. For money he would do anything; for money he would have sold his wife, his children, even his own soul, if he happened to have one. But that article, if it ever existed, was now so small and dry, that one might have fancied it to rattle in his lean frame like a shrivelled pea in a last year's peascod. Abijah was going to the camp-meeting for two reasons; one, of course, was to make money, and the other was to know whether his favourite preacher, elder Stringfellow, handled the doctrine of election according to his views; for Abijah had a turn for theology, and could number off the five points of Calvinism on his five long fingers with unfailing accuracy. It is stated in the Scriptures that the devils believe and tremble. The principal difference between their belief and Abijah's was, that he believed and did not tremble. Truths awful enough to have shaken the earth and veiled the sun he could finger off with as much unconcern as a practised anatomist the dry bones of a skeleton.

'You, Sam!' said Abijah to his only negro helot, 'you mind you steady that ar bar'l so that it don't roll out, and pour a pailful of water in at the bung. It won't do to give it 'em too strong. Miss Skinflint, you make haste, if you don't I shan't wait for you, 'cause, whatever the rest may do, it's important I should be on the ground early. Many a dollar lost for not being in time in this world. Hurry, woman!'

'I'm ready, but Polly an't!' said Mrs. Skinflint. 'She's busy a plastering down her hair.'

'Can't wait for her!' said Abijah, as he sallied out of the house to get into the wagon, which stood before the door, into which he had packed a copious supply of hams, eggs, dressed chickens, corn-meal, and green summer vegetables, to say nothing of the barrel of whiskey aforesaid.

'I say, dad, you stop!' called Polly, from the window. 'If you don't, I'll make work for you 'fore you come home; you see if I don't! Durned if I won't!'

'Come along, then, can't you? Next time we go anywhere I'll shut you up over night to begin to dress!'

Polly hastily squeezed her fat form into a red calico dress, and, seizing a gay summer shawl, with her bonnet in her hand, rushed to the wagon and mounted, the hooks of her dress successively exploding, and flying off, as she stooped to get in.

'Durned if I knows what to do!' said she; 'this yer old durned gear coat's all off my back!'

'Gals is always fools!' said Abijah, consolingly.

'Stick in a pin, Polly,' said her mother, in an easy, sing-song drawl.

'Durn you, old woman, every hook is off!' said the promising young lady.

'Stick in more pins, then,' said the mamma; and the vehicle of Abijah passed onward.

On the verge of the swamp a little beyond Tiff's cabin lived Ben Dakin. Ben was a mighty hunter; he had the best pack of dogs within thirty miles round; and his advertisements, still to be seen standing in the papers of his native state, detailed with great accuracy the precise terms on which he would hunt down or capture any man, woman, or child, escaping from service and labour in that country. Our readers must not necessarily suppose Ben to have been a monster for all this, when they recollect that within a few years, both the great political parties of our union solemnly pledged themselves, as far as in them lay, to accept a similar vocation; and, as many of them were in good and regular standing in churches, and had ministers to preach sermons to the same effect, we trust they'll entertain no unreasonable prejudice against Ben on this account. In fact Ben was a tall, broad-shouldered, bluff, hearty-looking fellow, who would do a kind turn for a neighbour, with as much goodwill as anybody; and, except that he now and then took a little too much whiskey, as he himself admitted, he considered himself quite as promising a candidate for the kingdom as any of the company who were going up to camp-meeting. Had any one ventured to remonstrate with Ben against the nature of his profession, he would probably have defended it by pretty much the same arguments by which modern theologians defend the institution of which it is a branch. Ben was just one of those jovial fellows who never could bear to be left behind in anything that was going on in the community, and was always one of the foremost in a camp-meeting.

He had a big, loud voice, and could roll out the chorus of hymns with astonishing effect. He was generally converted at every gathering of this kind; though, through the melancholy proclivity to whiskey, before alluded to, he usually fell from grace before the year was out. Like many other big and hearty men, he had a little, pale, withered, moonshiny wisp of a wife, who hung on his elbow much like an empty work-bag; and Ben to do him justice was kind to the wilted little mortal, as if he almost suspected that he had absorbed her vitality into his own exuberant growth. She was greatly given to eating clay, cleaning her teeth with snuff, and singing Methodist hymns, and had a very sincere concern for Ben's salvation. The little woman sat resignedly on the morning we speak of, while a long-limbed, broad-shouldered child of two years, with bristly white hair, was pulling her by her ears and hair, and otherwise maltreating her, to make her get up to give him a piece of bread and molasses; and she, without seeming to attend to the child, was giving earnest heed to her husband.

'There's a despit press of business now!' said Ben. 'There'

James' niggers, and Smith's Polly, and we ought to be on the trail, right away.'

'O, Ben, you ought to 'tend to your salvation afore anything else!' said his wife.

'That's true enough!' said Ben; 'meetings don't come every day. But what are we to do with dis yer'un?' pointing to the door of an inner room.

'Dis yer'un' was no other than a negro woman named Nance, who had been brought in by the dogs, the day before.

'Laws!' said his wife, 'we can set her something to eat, and leave the dogs in front of the door. She can't get out.'

Ben threw open the door, and displayed to view a low kind of hutch, without any other light than that between the crevices of the logs. On the floor, which was of hard-trodden earth, sat a sinewy, lean negro woman, drawing up her knees with her long arms, and resting her chin upon them.

'Hollo, Nance, how are you?' said Ben, rather cheerily.

'Porly, mas'r,' said the other, in a sullen tone.

'Nance, you think your old man will whale you, when he gets you?' said Ben.

'I reckons he will,' said Nance; 'he allers does.'

'Well, Nance, the old woman and I want to go to a camp-meeting; and I'll just tell you what it is,—you stay here quiet, while we are gone, and I'll make the old fellow promise not to wallop you. I wouldn't mind taking off something of the price—that's fair, an't it?'

'Yes, mas'r,' said the woman, in the same subdued tone.

'Does your foot hurt you much?' said Ben.

'Yes, mas'r,' said the woman.

'Let me look at it,' said Ben.

The woman put out one foot, which had been loosely bound up in old rags, now saturated in blood.

'I declar, if that ar dog an't a pealer!' said Ben. 'Nance, you ought ter have stood still; then he wouldn't have hurt you so.'

'Lord, he hurt me so I couldn't stand still!' said the woman. 'It an't natur to stand still with a critter's teeth in yer foot.'

'Well, I don't know as it is,' said Ben, good-naturedly.

'Here, Miss Dakin, you bind up this here gal's foot. Stop your noise, sir-ee!' he added, to the young aspirant for bread and molasses, who having despatched one piece, was clamoring vigorously for another. 'I'll tell you what,' said Ben, to his wife, 'I am going to talk to that ar old elder Settle. I runs more niggers for him than any man in the county, and I know there's some reason for it. Niggers don't run into swamps when they's treated well. Folks that professes religion, I think, oughtn't to starve their niggers, no way !'

Soon the vehicle of Ben was also on the road. He gathered up the reins vigorously, threw back his head to get the full benefit of his lungs, and commenced a vehement camp-meeting melody, to the tune of

"Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb?"

A hymn by-the-by which was one of Ben's particular favorites.

We come next to Tiff's cottage, of which the inmates were astir, in the coolness of the morning, bright and early. Tiff's wagon was a singular composite article, principally of his own construction. The body of it consisted of a long packing-box. The wheels were all odd ones, that had been brought home at different times by Cripps. The shafts were hickory poles, thinned at one end, and fastened to the wagon by nails. Some barrel-hoops bent over the top, covered by coarse white cotton cloth, formed the curtains, and a quantity of loose straw dispersed inside was the only seat. The lean, one-eyed horse was secured to this vehicle by a harness made of old ropes; but no millionaire, however, ever enjoyed his luxuriantly cushioned coach with half the relish with which Tiff enjoyed his equipage. It was the work of his hands, the darling of his heart, the delight of his eyes. To be sure, like other mortal darlings, it was to be admitted that it had its weak points and failings. The wheels would now and then come off, the shafts get loose, or the harness break; but Tiff was always prepared, and, on occasion of any such mishaps, would jump out and attend to them with such cheerful alacrity, that if anything he rather seemed to love it better for the accident. There it stands now, before the enclosure of the little cabin; and Tiff, and Fanny, and Teddy, with bustling assiduity, are packing and arranging it. The gum-tree cradle-trough took precedence of all other articles. Tiff, by the private advice of aunt Rose, had just added to this an improvement, which placed it, in his view, tip-top among cradles. He had nailed to one end of it a long splint of elastic hickory, which drooped just over the baby's face. From this was suspended a morsel of salt pork, which this young-scion of a noble race sucked with a considerable relish, while his large round eyes opened and shut with sleepy satisfaction. This arrangement Rose had recommended, in mysterious tones, as all-powerful in making sucking babies forget their manmies, whom otherwise they might pine for, in a manner prejudicial to their health. Although the day was sultry, Tiff was arrayed in his long-skirted white great-coat, as his nether garments were in too dilapidated a state to consist with the honour of the family; his white felt hat still bore the band of black crape.

'It's a 'mazin' good day, bress de Lord!' said Tiff. 'Pears like dese yer birds would split der troats praising de Lord. It's a mighty good zample to us, any way. You see, Miss Fanny, you never see birds put out, nor snarly like, rain or shine. Dey's allers a praising de Lord. Lord, it seems as if critters is better dan we be!' And as Tiff spoke he shouldered into the wagon a mighty bag of corn; but failing in what he meant to do, the bag slid over the side, and tumbled into the road. Being somewhat of the oldest, the fall burst it asunder, and the corn rolled into the sand with that provoking alacrity which things always have when they go the wrong way. Fanny and Teddy both uttered an exclamation of lamentation; but Tiff held on to his sides and laughed till the tears rolled down his cheeks. 'He! he! he! ho! ho! ho! Why, dat ar is de last bag we's got, and dar's all de corn running out in de sand! Ho! ho! ho! Lord, it's so curus!'

'Why, what are you going to do?' said Fanny.

'O, bress you, Miss Fanny,' said Tiff, 'I's bound to do something, any how. 'Clare for it, now, if I han't got a box!' And Tiff soon returned with the article in question, which proved too large for the wagon. The corn, however, was emptied into it pro tem., and Tiff, producing his darning-needle and thimble, sat down seriously to the task of stitching up the hole. 'De Lord's things an't never in a hurry,' said Tiff. 'Corn and 'tatoes will have der time, and why shouldn't I? Dar,' he said, after having mended the bag and replaced the corn, 'dat ar's better now nor 't was before.'

Besides his own store of provisions, Tiff prudently laid into his wagon enough of garden stuff to turn a penny for Miss Fanny and the children, on the camp-ground. His commissariat department, in fact, might have provoked appetite, even among the fastidious. There were dressed chickens and rabbits, the cooh aforesaid, bundles of savory herbs, crisp, dewy lettuce, bunches of onions, radishes, and green peas. 'Tell ye what, chil'en,' said Tiff, 'we'll live like princes! 'And you mind, order me round well. Let folks har ye; 'cause what's de use of having a nigger, and nobody knowing it?" And everything being arranged, Tiff got in, and jogged comfortably along.

At the turn of the cross-road, Tiff, looking a little behind, saw, on the other road, the Gordon carriage coming, driven by Old Hundred, arrayed in his very best ruffled shirt, white gloves, and gold hat-band. If ever Tiff came near having a pang in his heart, it was at that moment; but he retreated stoutly upon the idea that, however appearances might be against them, his family was no less ancient and honourable for that; and, therefore, putting on all his dignity, he gave his beast an extra cut, as who should say, 'I don't care.' But, as ill luck would have it, the horse, at this instant, giving a jerk, wrenched out the nails that fastened the shaft on one side, and it fell trailing dishonoured on the ground. The rope harness pulled all awry, and just at this moment the Gordon carriage swept up.

'Fore I'd drive sich old trash!' said Old Hundred, scornfully; 'pulls all to pieces every step! if dat ar an't a poor white folksy's 'stablishment, I never seed one!'

'What's the matter?' said Nina, putting her head out. 'O, Tiff, good morning, my good fellow. Can we help you there? John get down and help him.'

'Please, Miss Nina, de hosses is so full o' tickle dis yer mornin,' I couldn't let go, no ways!' said Old Hundred.

'O, laws bless you, Miss Nina,' said Tiff, restored to his usual spirits, 'it an't nothin. Broke in a strordinary good place dis yer time. I ken hammer it up in a minute.'

And Tiff was as good as his word, for a round stone and big nail made all straight.

'Pray,' said Nina, 'how are little Miss Fanny and the children?' 'Miss Fanny!' If Nina had heaped Tiff with presents she could not have conferred the inexpressible obligation conveyed in these words. He bowed low to the ground with the weight of satisfaction, and answered that 'Miss Fanny and the chil'en were well.'

'There,' said Nina, 'John you may drive on. Do you know, I've set Tiff up for six weeks, by one word? Just saying. Miss Fanny has done more for him than if I'd sent him six bushels of potatoes.'

We have yet to take our readers to one more scene before we finish the review of those who were going to the camp-meeting.

The reader must follow us far beyond the abodes of man, into the recesses of that wild desolation known as the 'Dismal Swamp.' We pass over vast tracts where the forest seems growing out of the water. Cypress, red cedar, sweet gum, tulip, poplar, beech, and holly, form a goodly fellowship, waving their rustling boughs above. The trees shoot up in vast columns, fifty, seventy-five, and a hundred feet in height; and below are clusters of evergreen gall bushes, with their thick and glossy foliage, mingled in with swamp honeysuckles, grape-vines, twining brier, and laurels, and other shrubs, forming an impenetrable thicket. The creeping plants sometimes climb seventy or eighty feet up the largest trees, and hang in heavy festoons from their branches.

It would seem impossible that human foot could penetrate the wild, impervious jungle; but we must take our readers through it to a cleared spot, where trunks of fallen trees, long decayed, have formed an island of vegetable mould, which the art of some human hand has extended and improved. The clearing is some sixty yards long by thirty broad, and is surrounded with a natural rampart, which might well bid defiance to man or beast. Huge trees have been felled, with all their branches lying thickly one over another, in a circuit around; and Nature, seconding the efforts of the fugitives who sought refuge here, has interlaced the framework thus made with thorny cat-briers, cables of grape-vine, and thickets of Virginia creeper, which running wild in their exuberance, climb on to the neighbouring trees, and swinging down again, lose themselves in the mazes from which they sprung, so as often to form a verdurous wall fifty feet in height. In some places the laurel, with its glossy green leaves, and its masses of pink-tipped snowy blossoms, presents to the eye, rank above rank, a wilderness of beauty. The pendants of the yellow jessamine swing to and fro in the air like censers, casting forth clouds of perfume. A thousand twining vines, with flowers of untold name, perhaps unknown as yet to the botanist, help to fill up the mosaic. The leafy ramparts sweep round on all the sides of the clearing, for the utmost care has been taken to make it impenetrable; and in that region of heat and moisture, Nature in the course of a few weeks, admirably seconds every human effort. The only egress from it, is by a winding path cut through with a hatchet, which can be entered by only one person at a time; and the water which surrounds this island entirely cuts off the trail from the scent of dogs. It is to be remarked that the climate in the interior of the swamp is far from being unhealthy. Lumber-men, who spend great portions of the year in it, cutting shingles and staves, testify to the general salubrity of the air and water. The opinion prevails among them that the quantity of pine and other resinous trees that grow there, impart a balsamic property to the water, and impregnate the air with a healthy resinous fragrance, which causes it to be an exception to the usual rule of the unhealthiness of swampy land; the soil also, when drained sufficiently for purposes of culture, is profusely fertile.

Two small cabins stood around the border of the clearing, but the centre was occupied with patches of corn and sweet potatoes, planted there to secure as much as possible the advantage of sun and air. At the time we take our readers there, the afternoon sun of a sultry June day is casting its long shadows over the place, and a whole choir of birds is echoing in the branches. On the ground in front of one of the cabins, lies a negro-man, covered with blood; two women, with some little children are grouped beside him; and a wild figure whom we at once recognise as Dred, is kneeling by him, busy in efforts to stanch a desperate wound in the neck. In vain! The dark blood spurts out at every pulsation of the heart, with a fearful regularity, telling too plainly that it is a great life-artery which has been laid open. The negro-woman, kneeling on the other side, is anxiously holding some bandages, which she has stripped from a portion of her raiment.

‘O, put these on, quick—do!’

‘O, do!—don’t, don’t let him go! Can’t you save him?’ said the woman, in tones of agony.

The wounded man’s eyes opened, and first fixed themselves, with a vacant stare, on the blue sky above, then turning on the woman, he seemed to try to speak. He had had a strong arm; he tries to raise it, but the blood wells up with the effort, the eye glazes, the large frame shivers for a few moments, and then all is still. The blood stops flowing now, for the heart has stopped beating, and an immortal soul has gone back to Him who gave it. The man was a fugitive from a neighbouring plantation—a simple-hearted, honest fellow, who had fled, with his wife and children, to save her from the licentious persecution of the overseer. Dred had received and sheltered him; had built him a cabin, and protected him for months. A provision of the Revised Statutes of North Carolina enacts that slaves thus secreted in the swamps, not returning within a given time, shall be considered outlawed; and that 'it shall be lawful for any person or persons whatsoever to kill and destroy such slaves, by such ways and means as they shall think fit, without any accusation or impeachment of crime for the same.' It also provides that, when any slave shall be killed in consequence of such outlawry, the value of such slave shall be ascertained by a jury, and the owner entitled to receive two-thirds of the valuation from the sheriff of the county wherein the slave was killed. In olden times the statute provided that the proclamation of outlawry should be published on a sabbath-day, at the door of any church or chapel, or place where divine service should be performed, immediately after divine service, by the parish clerk or reader. In the spirit of this permission, a party of negro-hunters, with dogs and guns, had chased this man, who, on this day, had unfortunately ventured out of his concealment. He succeeded in outrunning all but one dog, which sprang up, and fastening his fangs in his throat, laid him prostrate within a few paces of his retreat. Dred came up in time to kill the dog, but the wound, as appeared, had proved a mortal one.

As soon as the wife perceived that her husband was really dead, she broke into a loud wail. 'O, dear, he's gone! and 'twas all for me he did it! O, he was so good, such a good man! O, do tell me, is he dead, is he?' Dred lifted the yet warm hand in his a moment, and then dropped it heavily. 'Dead!' he said, in a deep under-tone of suppressed emotion. Suddenly kneeling down beside him, he lifted his hands and broke forth with wild vehemence, 'O, Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth, show thyself! Lift up thyself, thou Judge of the earth, render a reward to the proud! Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not. Thou O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer; thy ways are everlasting. Where is thy zeal and thy strength, and the sounding of thy bowels towards us? Are they restrained?' Then tossing his hands to heaven, with a yet wilder gesture, he almost screamed, 'O Lord! O Lord! how long? O, that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down! O, let the sighings of the prisoner come before thee! Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood! We are given as sheep to the slaughter! We are killed all the day long! O Lord, avenge us of our adversaries!' These words were spoken with a vehement earnestness of gesture and voice that hushed the lamentations of the mourners. Rising up from his knees, he stood a moment looking down at the lifeless form before him. 'See here,' he said, 'what harm has this man done? Was he not peaceable? Did he not live here in quietness, tilling the ground in the sweat of his brow? Why have they sent the hunters upon him? Because he wanted to raise his corn for himself, and not for another. Because he wanted his wife for himself and not for another. Was not the world wide enough? Isn't there room enough under the sky? Because this man wished to eat the fruit of his labour, the decree went forth against him, even the curse of Cain, so that whosoever findeth him shall kill him. Will not the Lord be avenged on such a people as this? To-night they will hold their solemn assembly, and blow the trumpet in their new moon, and the prophets will prophesy falsely, and the priests will speak wickedly concerning oppression. The word of the Lord saith unto me, "Go unto this people, and break before them the staff Beauty, and the staff Bands, and be a sign unto this people of the terror of the Lord. Behold, saith the Lord, therefore have I raised thee up and led thee through the wilderness, through the desolate places of the land not sown."'

As Dred spoke his great black eye seemed to enlarge itself and roll with a glassy fulness, like that of a sleep-walker in a somnambulic dream. His wife, seeing him prepare to depart, threw herself upon him.

'O, don't, don't leave us. You'll be killed some of these times, just as they killed him!'

'Woman! the burden of the Lord is upon me. The word of the Lord is as a fire shut up in my bones. The Lord saith unto me, "Go show unto this people their iniquity, and be a sign unto this evil nation!"' Breaking away from his wife, he precipitated himself through an opening in the thicket, and was gone.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE CAMP-MEETING.

THE place selected for the camp-meeting was in one of the most picturesque portions of the neighbourhood. It was a small partially-cleared spot, in the midst of a dense forest, which stretched away in every direction in cool green aisles of chequered light and shade. In the central clearing, a sort of rude amphitheatre of seats was formed of rough pine-slabs. Around, on the edges of the forest, the tents of the various worshippers were pitched ; for the spending of three or four days and nights upon the ground is deemed an essential part of the service. The same clear stream which wound round the dwelling of Tiff prattled its way, with a modest gurgle, through this forest, and furnished the assembly with water. The Gordons having come merely for the purposes of curiosity, and having a residence in the neighbourhood, did not provide themselves with a tent. The servants, however, were less easily satisfied. Aunt Rose shook her head and declared oracularly, that 'de blessing was sure to come down in de night, and dem dat wanted to get a part of it would have to be dar.' Consequently, Nina was beset to allow her people to have a tent, in which they were to take turns in staying all night, as candidates for the blessing. In compliance with that law of good-humoured indulgence which had been the traditionary usage of her family, Nina acceded, and the Gordon tent spread its snowy sails, to the rejoicing of their hearts. Aunt Rose predominated about the door, alternately slapping the children and joining the chorus of hymns which she heard from every part of the campground.

On the outskirts were various rude booths, in which whiskey and water, and sundry articles of provision and fodder for horses, were dispensed for a consideration. Abijah Skinflint here figured among the money-changers, while his wife and daughter were gossiping through the tents with the women.

In front of the seats, under a dense cluster of pines, was the preachers' stand, a rude stage of rough boards, with a railing around it, and a desk of small slabs supporting a Bible and a hymn-book. The preachers were already assembling, and no small curiosity was expressed with regard to them by the people who were walking up and down among the tents. Nina, leaning on the arm of Clayton, walked about the area with the rest. Anne Clayton leaned on the arm of uncle John. Aunt Nesbit and aunt Maria came behind.

To Nina the scene was quite new, for a long residence in the northern states had placed her out of the way of such things ; and her shrewd insight into character, and her love of drollery, found an abundant satisfaction in the various little points and oddities of the scene. They walked to the Gordon tent, in which a preliminary meeting was already in full course. A circle of men and women, interspersed with children, were sitting, with their eyes shut and their heads thrown back, singing at the top of their voices. Occasionally one or other would vary the exercises by clapping of hands, jumping up straight into the air, falling flat on the ground, screaming, dancing, and laughing. 'O, set me up on a rock!' screamed one. 'I's sot up!' screamed another. 'Glory!' cried the third, and a tempest of 'amens' poured in between. 'I's got a 'sperience!' cried one, and forthwith began piping it out in a high key, while others kept on singing. 'I's got a 'sperience!' shouted Tomtit, whom aunt Rose, with maternal care, had taken with her. 'No you an't, neither; sit down!' said aunt Rose, kneading him down as if he had been a batch of biscuits, and going on at the same time with her hymn. 'I's on the Rock of Ages!' screamed a neighbour. 'I want to get on a rock edgeways!' screamed Tomtit, struggling desperately with aunt Rose's great fat hands. 'Mind yourself! I'll crack you over!' said aunt Rose. And Tomtit, still continuing rebellious, was cracked over accordingly, with such force as to send him head-foremost on the straw at the bottom of the tent—an indignity which he resented with loud howls of impotent wrath, which, however, made no impression on the general whirlwind of screaming, shouting, and praying.

Nina and uncle John stood at the tent-door, laughing heartily. Clayton looked on with his usual thoughtful gravity of aspect. Anne turned her head away with an air of disgust.

'Why don't you laugh?' said Nina, looking round at her.

'It doesn't make me feel like it,' said Anne. 'It makes me feel melancholy.'

'Why so?'

'Because religion is a sacred thing with me, and I don't like to see it travestied,' said she.

'O,' said Nina, 'I don't respect religion any the less for a good laugh at its oddities. I believe I was born without any organ of reverence, and so don't feel the incongruity of the thing, as you do. The distance between laughing and praying isn't so very wide in my mind as it is in some people's.'

'We must have charity,' said Clayton, 'for every religious manifestation. Barbarous and half-civilized people always find the necessity for outward and bodily demonstration in worship. I suppose because the nervous excitement wakes up and animates their spiritual natures, and gets them into a receptive state, just as you have to shake up sleeping persons, and scream in their ears to put them in a condition to understand you. I have known real conversions to take place under just these excitements.'

'But,' said Anne, 'I think we might teach them to be decent. These things ought not to be allowed.'

'I believe,' said Clayton, 'intolerance is a rooted vice in our nature. The world is as full of different minds and bodies as the woods are of leaves; and each one has its own habit of growth. And yet our first impulse is to forbid everything that would not be proper for us. No, let the African scream, dance, and shout, and fall in trances. It suits his tropical lineage and blood, as much as our thoughtful inward ways do us.'

'I wonder who that is!' said Nina, as a general movement on the ground proclaimed the arrival of some one who appeared to be exciting general interest. The stranger was an unusually tall, portly man, apparently somewhat past the middle of life, whose erect carriage, full figure, and red cheeks, and a certain dashing frankness of manner, might have indicated him as belonging rather to the military than the clerical profession. He carried a rifle on his shoulder, which he set down carefully against the corner of the preachers' stand, and went around shaking hands among the company, with a free and jovial air that might almost be described by the term rollicking.

'Why,' said uncle John, 'that's father Bonnie! How are you, my fine fellow?'

'What! you, Mr. Gordon? How do you do?' said father Bonnie, grasping his hand in his, and shaking it heartily. 'Why, they tell me,' he said, looking at him with a jovial smile, 'that you have fallen from grace!'

'Even so,' said uncle John. 'I am a sad dog, I dare say.'

'O, I tell you what,' said father Bonnie, 'but it takes a strong hook and a long line to pull in you rich sinners! Your money-bags and your niggers hang round you like mill-stones! You are too tough for the gospel! Ah!' said he, shaking his fist at him, playfully, 'but I'm going to come down upon you, to-day, with the law, I can tell you! You want the thunders of Sinai! You must have a dose of the law!'

'Well,' said uncle John, 'thunder away; I suppose we need it, all of us. But now, father Bonnie, you ministers are always preaching to us poor dogs on the evils of riches; but, somehow, I don't see any of you that are much afraid of owning horses, or niggers, or any other good thing that you can get your hands on. Now, I hear that you've got a pretty snug little place, and a likely drove to work it. You'll have to look out for your own soul, father Bonnie!

A general laugh echoed this retort; for father Bonnie had the reputation of being a shrewder hand at a bargain, and of having more expertness in swapping a horse or trading a negro, than any other man for six counties round.

'He's in to you, now, old man!' said several of the bystanders, laughingly.

'O, as to that,' said father Bonnie, laughing also, 'I go in with Paul,—they that preach the gospel must live of the gospel. Now, Paul was a man that stood up for his rights to live as other folks do.—"Isn't it right," says he, "that those that plant a vineyard should first eat of the fruit? Haven't we power to lead about a sister, a wife?" says he. And if Paul had lived in our time, he would have said a drove of niggers too! No danger about us ministers being hurt by riches, while you laymen are so slow about supporting the gospel!'

At the elbow of father Bonnie stood a brother minister, who was, in many respects, his contrast. He was tall, thin, and stooping, with earnest black eyes, and a serene sweetness of expression. A thread-bare suit of rusty black, evidently carefully worn, showed the poverty of his worldly estate. He carried in his hand a small portmanteau, probably containing a change of linen, his Bible, and a few sermons. Father Dickson was a man extensively known through all that region. He was one of those men, among the ministers of America, who keep alive our faith in Christianity, and renew on earth the portrait of the old apostle:—"In journeyings often, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Besides those things that are without, that which cometh upon them daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and they are not weak? Who is offended, and they burn not?" Every one in the state knew and respected father Dickson; and, like the generality of the world, people were very well pleased, and thought it extremely proper and meritorious for him to bear weariness and painfulness, hunger and cold, in their spiritual service, leaving to them the right of attending or not attending to him according to their own convenience. Father Dickson was one of those who had never yielded to the common customs and habits of the country, in regard to the holding of slaves. A few, who had been left him by a relation, he had, at great trouble and expense, transported to a free state, and settled there comfortably. The world need not trouble itself with seeking to know or reward such men ; for the world cannot know, and has no power to reward them. Their citizenship is in heaven ; and all that can be given them in this life is like a morsel which a peasant gives in his cottage to him who to-morrow will reign over a kingdom. He had stood listening to the conversation thus far with the grave yet indulgent air with which he generally listened to the sallies of his ministerial brothers.

Father Bonnie, though not as much respected or confided in as father Dickson, had, from the frankness of his manners, and a certain rude, but effective style of eloquence, a more general and apparent popularity. He produced more sensation on the campground ; could sing louder and longer, and would often rise into flights of eloquence both original and impressive. Many were offended by the freedom of his manner out of the pulpit ; and the stricter sort were known to have said of him ' that when out, he never ought to be in—and when in, never out.'

As the laugh that rose at his last sally died away, he turned to father Dickson, and said,

' What do you think ?'

' I don't think,' said father Dickson, mildly, ' that you would ever have found Paul leading a drove of negroes.'

' Why not, as well as Abraham, the father of the faithful ? Didn't he have three hundred trained servants ?'

' Servants, perhaps ; but not slaves !' said father Dickson, ' for they all bore arms. For my part, I think that the buying, selling, and trading of human beings for purposes of gain, is a sin in the sight of God.'

' Well, now, father Dickson, I wouldn't have thought you had read your Bible to so little purpose as that ! I wouldn't believe it ! What do you say to Moses ?'

' He led out a whole army of fugitive slaves through the Red Sea,' said father Dickson.

' Well, I tell you, now,' said father Bonnie, ' if the buying, selling, or holding of a slave for the sake of gain is, as you say, a sin, then three-fourths of all the Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians in the slave states of the Union, are of the devil !'

' I think it is a sin, notwithstanding,' said father Dickson, quietly.

' Well, but doesn't Moses say expressly, " Ye shall buy of the heathen round about you ?"'

' There's into him !' said a Georgian trader, who, having camped with a cofile of negroes in the neighborhood, had come up to camp-meeting.

'All those things,' said father Dickson, 'belong to the old covenant, which Paul says was annulled for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof, and have nothing to do with us, who have risen with Christ. We have got past Mount Sinai and the wilderness, and have come unto Mount Zion; and ought to seek the things that are above, where Christ sitteth.'

'I say, brother,' said another of the ministers, tapping him on the shoulder, 'it's time for the preaching to begin. You can finish your discussion some other time. Come, father Bonnie, come forward here, and strike up the hymn.'

Father Bonnie accordingly stepped to the front of the stand, and with him another minister, of equal height and breadth of frame, and, standing with their hats on, they uplifted, in stentorian voices, the following hymn:—

"Brethren, don't you hear the sound?
The martial trumpet now is blowing;
Men in order 'listing round,
And soldiers to the standard flowing."

As the sound of the hymn rolled through the aisles and arches of the woods, the heads of different groups, who had been engaged in conversation, were observed turning towards the stand, and voices from every part of the camp-ground took up the air, as, suiting the action to the words, they began flowing to the place of preaching. The hymn went on, keeping up the same martial images:

"Bounty offered, life and peace;
To every soldier this is given,
When the toils of life shall cease,
A mansion bright prepared in heaven."

As the throng pressed up, and came crowding from the distant aisles of the wood, the singers seemed to exert themselves to throw a wilder vehemence into the song, stretching out their arms and beckoning eagerly. They went on singing—

"You need not fear; the cause is good,
Let who will to the crown aspire;
In this cause the martyrs bled,
And shouted victory in the fire.
In this cause let's follow on,
And soon we'll tell the pleasing story
How by faith we won the crown,
And fought our way to life and glory."

"O, ye rebels, come and 'list;
 The officers are now recruiting:
 Why will you in sin persist,
 Or waste your time in vain disputing?"

"All excuses now are vain;
 For, if you do not sue for favour,
 Down you'll sink to endless pain,
 And bear the wrath of God for ever."

There is always something awful in the voice of the multitude. It would seem as if the breath that a crowd breathed out together, in moments of enthusiasm, carried with it a portion of the dread and mystery of their own immortal natures. The whole area before the pulpit, and in the distant aisles of the forest, became one vast, surging sea of sound, as negroes and whites, slaves and freemen, saints and sinners, slave-holders, slave-hunters, slave-traders, ministers, elders, and laymen, alike joined in the pulses of that mighty song. A flood of electrical excitement seemed to rise with it as, with a voice of many waters, the rude chant went on—

"Hark! the victors singing loud!
 Emmanuel's chariot-wheels are rumbling;
 Mourners weeping through the crowd,
 And Satan's kingdom down is tumbling!"

Our friend Ben Dakin pressed to the stand, and, with tears streaming down his cheeks, exceeded all others in the energy of his vociferations. Ben had just come from almost a fight with another slave-hunter, who had boasted a better-trained pack of dogs than his own; and had broken away to hurry to the campground with the assurance that he'd 'give him fits when the preachin' was over.' And now he stood there, tears rolling down his cheeks, singing with the heartiest earnestness and devotion. What shall we make of it? Poor heathen Ben! is it any more out of the way for him to think of being a Christian in this manner, than for some of his more decent brethren, who take Sunday passage for eternity in the cushioned New York or Boston pews, and solemnly drowse through very sleepy tunes, under a dim, hazy impression that they are going to heaven. Of the two we think Ben's chance is the best; for in some blind way, he does think himself a sinner, and in need of something he calls salvation; and, doubtless, while the tears stream down his face, the poor fellow makes a new resolve against the whiskey bottle; while his more respectable sleepy brethren never think of making one against the cotton-bale. Then there was his rival also, Jim Stokes, a surly, foul-mouthed, swearing fellow; he joins in the chorus of the hymn, and feels a troublous, vague yearning deep down within him, which makes him for the moment doubt whether he had better knock down Ben at the end of the meeting. As to Harry, who stood also among the crowd, the words and tune recalled but too vividly the incidents of his morning's interview with Dred, and with it the tumultuous boiling of his bitter controversy with the laws of the society in which he found himself. In hours of such high excitement, a man seems to have an intuitive perception of the whole extent and strength of what is within himself; and if there be anything unnatural or false in his position, he realizes it with double intensity. Mr. John Gordon, likewise, gave himself up, without resistance, to be swayed by the feeling of the hour. He sung with enthusiasm, and wished he was a soldier of somebody, going somewhere, or a martyr shouting victory in the fire; and if the conflict described had been with any other foe than his own laziness and self-indulgence—had there been any outward, tangible enemy at the moment—he would doubtless have enlisted, without loss of time.

When the hymn was finished, however, there was a general wiping of eyes, and they all sat down to listen to the sermon. Father Bonnie led off in an animated strain. His discourse was like the tropical swamp, bursting out with a lush abundance of every kind of growth—grave, gay, grotesque, solemn, fanciful, and even coarse caricature, provoking the broadest laughter. The audience were swayed by him like trees before the wind. There were not wanting touches of rude pathos, as well as earnest appeals. The meeting was a union one of Presbyterians and Methodists, in which the ministers of both denominations took equal part; it was an understood agreement among them, of course, that they were not to venture upon polemic ground, or attack each other's peculiarities of doctrine. But Abijah's favourite preacher could not get through a sermon without some quite pointed exposition of Scripture bearing on his favourite doctrine of election, which caused the next minister to run a vehement tilt on the correlative doctrines of free grace, with a eulogy on John Wesley. The auditors, meanwhile, according to their respective sentiments, encouraged each preacher with a cry of 'Amen!' 'Glory be to God!' 'Go on, brother!' and other similar exclamations. About noon the services terminated, pro tem., and the audience dispersed themselves to their respective tents through the grove, where there was an abundance of chatting, visiting, eating, and drinking, as if the vehement denunciations and passionate appeals of the morning had been things of another state of existence. Uncle John, in the most cheery possible frame of mind, escorted his party into the woods, and assisted them in unpacking a hamper containing wine, cold fowls, cakes, pies, and other delicacies which aunt Katy had packed for the occasion. Old Tiff had set up his tent in a snug little nook on the banks of the stream, where he informed passers-by that it was his young mas'r and missis's establishment; and that he, Tiff, had come to wait on them. With a good-natured view of doing him a pleasure, Nina selected a spot for their nooning at no great distance, and spoke in the most gracious and encouraging manner to them from time to time.

'See, now, can't you, how real quality behaves demselves!' he said, grimly, to Old Hundred, who came up bringing the carriage cushions for the party to sit down upon. 'Real quality sees into things! I tell you what, blood sees into blood. Miss Nina sees dese yer chil'en an't de common sort—dat's what she does!'

'Humph!' said Old Hundred, 'such a muss as ye keep up about yer chil'en! Tell you what, dey an't no better dan oder white trash!'

'How! you talk dat ar way, I'll knock you down!' said old Tiff, who though a peaceable and law-abiding creature in general, was driven in desperation to the last resort of force.

'John, what are you saying to Tiff?' said Nina, who had overheard some of the last words. 'Go back to your own tent, and don't you trouble him! I have taken him under my protection.'

The party enjoyed their dinner with infinite relish, and Nina amused herself in watching Tiff's cooking preparations. Before departing to the preaching ground, he had arranged a slow fire, on which a savory stew had been all the morning simmering, and which, on the taking off of the pot-lid, diffused an agreeable odour through the place.

'I say, Tiff, how delightfully that smells!' said Nina, getting up, and looking into the pot. 'Wouldn't Miss Fanny be so kind as to favor us with a taste of it?'

Fanny, to whom Tiff punctiliously referred the question, gave a bashful consent. But who shall describe the pride and glory that swelled the heart of Tiff as he saw a bowl of his stew smoking among the Gordon viands, praised and patronized by the party? And when Nina placed on their simple board,—literally a board, and nothing more—a small loaf of frosted cake, in exchange, it certainly required all the grace of the morning exercises to keep Tiff within due bounds of humility. He really seemed to dilate with satisfaction.

‘Tiff, how did you like the sermon?’ said Nina,

‘Der’s pretty far, Miss Nina. Der’s a good deal o’ quality preaching.’

‘What do you mean by quality preaching, Tiff?’

‘Why, dat ar kind dat’s good for quality—full of long words you know. I ’spects it’s very good; but poor niggers like me can’t see his way through it. You see, Miss Nina, what I’s studdin’ on, lately, is, how to get dese yer chil’en to Canaan; and I hars fus with one ear, and den with t’oder, but ’pears like an’t clar ’bout it, yet. Dere’s a heap about most everything else, and it’s all very good; but ’pears like I an’t clar arter all about dat ar. Dey says, “Come to Christ;” and I says, “Whar is he, any how?” Bress you, I want to come! Dey talks ’bout going in de gate, and knocking at de do’, and ’bout marching on de road, and ’bout fighting and being soldiers of de cross; and de Lord knows, now, I’d be glad to get de chil’en through any gate; and I could take ’em on my back and travel all day, if dere was any road; and if dere was a do’, bless me, if dey wouldn’t hear old Tiff a rapping! I ’spects de Lord would have fur to open it—would so. But, arter all, when de preaching is done, dere don’t ’pear to be notfing to it. Dere an’t no gate, dere an’t no do’, nor no way; and dere an’t no fighting, ’cept when Ben Dakin and Jim Stokes get jawing about der dogs; and everybody comes back eating der dinner quite comfortable, and ’pears like dere wan’t no such thing dey’s been preaching ’bout. Dat ar troubles me—does so—’cause I wants fur to get dese yer chil’en in de kingdom, some way or other. I didn’t know but some of de quality would know more ’bout it.’

‘Hang me, if I haven’t felt just so!’ said uncle John. ‘When they were singing that hymn about enlisting, and being a soldier, if there had been any fighting doing anywhere, I should have certainly gone right into it; and the preaching always stirs me up terribly. But, then, as Tiff says, after it’s all over, why, there’s dinner to be eaten, and I can’t see anything better than to eat it; and then by the time I have drank two or three glasses of wine, it’s all gone. Now that’s just the way with me!’

‘Dey says,’ said Tiff, ‘dat we must wait for de blessing to come down upon us, and aunt Rose says it’s dem dat shouts dat gets de blessing; and I's been shouting till I's most beat out, but I hasn't got it. Den, one of dem said none of dem could get it but de 'lect; but, den, t'oder one, he seemed to think different; and in de meeting dey tells about de scales falling from der eyes,—and I wished dey fall from mine—I do so! Perhaps Miss Nina, now, you could tell me something.'

'O, don't ask me!' said Nina; 'I don't know anything about these things. I think I feel a little like uncle John,' she said, turning to Clayton. 'There are two kinds of sermons and hymns; one gets me to sleep, and the other excites and stirs me up in a general kind of way; but they don't either seem to do me real good.'

'For my part, I am such an enemy to stagnation,' said Clayton, 'that I think there is advantage in everything that stirs up the soul, even though we see no immediate results. I listen to music, see pictures, as far as I can, uncritically. I say, "Here I am, see what you can do with me." So I present myself to almost all religious exercises. It is the most mysterious part of our nature, I do not pretend to understand it, therefore never criticise.'

'For my part,' said Anne, 'there is so much in the wild freedom of these meetings that shocks my taste and sense of propriety, that I am annoyed more than I am benefited.'

'There spoke the true, well-trained conventionalist,' said Clayton. 'But look around you. See, in this wood, among these flowers, and festoons of vine, and arches of green, how many shocking, unsightly growths! You would not have had all this underbush, these dead limbs, these briers running riot over trees, and sometimes choking and killing them. You would have well-trimmed trees, and velvet turf. But I love briers, dead limbs, and all, for their very savage freedom. Every once in a while you see in a wood a jessamine, or a sweet-brier, or a grape-vine, that throws itself into a gracefulness of growth which a landscape gardener would go down on his knees for, but cannot get. Nature resolutely denies it to him; she says, "No! I keep this for my own. You won't have my wildness—my freedom; very well, then you shall not have the graces that spring from it!" Just so it is with men. Unite any assembly of common men in a great enthusiasm,—work them up into an abandon, and let every one "let go," and speak as Nature prompts,—and you will have brush, underwood, briers, and all grotesque growths; but, now and then, some thought or sentiment will be struck out with a freedom or power such as you cannot get in any other way. You cultivated people are much mistaken when you despise the enthusiasm of the masses. There is more truth than you think in the old "Vox populi, vox Dei!"

'What's that?' said Nina.

"The voice of the people is the voice of God!" There is truth in it. I never repent my share in a popular excitement, provided it be of the higher sentiments; and I do not ask too strictly whether it has produced any tangible results. I reverence the people as I do the woods, for the wild, grand freedom with which their humanity develops itself.

'I'm afraid, Nina,' said aunt Nesbit, in a low tone to the latter, 'I'm afraid he isn't orthodox.'

'What makes you think so, aunt?'

'O, I don't know; his talk hasn't the real sound.'

'You want something that ends in 'ation! don't you, aunt?— justification, sanctification, or something of that kind.'

Meanwhile the department of Abijah Skinflint exhibited a decided activity. This was a long, low booth, made of poles, and roofed with newly-cut green boughs. Here the whiskey-barrel was continually pouring forth its supplies to customers who crowded around it. Abijah sat on the middle of a sort of rude counter, dangling his legs and chewing a straw, while his negro was busy helping his various customers. Abijah, as we said, being a particularly high Calvinist, was recreating himself by carrying on a discussion with a fat, little turnipy brother, of the Methodist persuasion.

'I say,' he said, 'Stringfellow put it into you Methodists, this morning! Hit the nail on the head, I thought!'

'Not a bit of it!' said the other, contemptuously. 'Why, elder Baskum chawed him up, completely! There wan't nothin' left of him!'

'Well,' said Abijah, 'strange how folks will see things! Why! it's just as clar to me that all things is decreed! Why, that ar nails everything up tight and handsome. It gives a fellow a kind of comfort to think on it. Things is just as they have got to be. All this free-grace stuff is dreadful loose talk. If things is been decreed 'fore the world was made, well, there seems to be some sense in their coming to pass. But if every-thing kind of turns up whenever folks think on't, its a kind of shaky business.'

'I don't like this tying up things so tight,' said the other, who evidently was one of the free, jovial order. 'I go in for the freedom of the will. Free gospel and free grace.'

'For my part,' said Abijah, rather grimly, 'if things were managed my way, I shouldn't commune with nobody that didn't believe in election, "up to the hub."'

'Your strong electioners think you's among the elect!' said one of the bystanders. 'You wouldn't be so crank about it, if you didn't! Now, see here: if everything is decreed, how am I going to help myself?'

'That ar is none of my look out,' said Abijah. 'But there's a pint my mind rests upon—everything is fixed as it can be, and it makes a man mighty easy.'

In another part of the camp-ground, Ben Dakin was sitting in his tent door, caressing one of his favourite dogs, and partaking his noontide repast with his wife and child.

'I declare,' said Ben, wiping his mouth, 'wife, I intend to go into it, and serve the Lord now, full chisel! If I catch the next lot of niggers, I intend to give half the money towards keeping up preaching somewhere round here. I am going to enlist now and be a soldier!'

'And,' said his wife, 'Ben, just keep clear of Abijah Skinflint's counter, won't you?'

'Well, I will, durned if I won't!' said Ben. 'I'll be moderate. A fellow wants a glass or two, to strike up the hymn on, you know; but I'll be moderate.'

The Georgia trader, who had encamped in the neighbourhood, now came up.

'Do you believe, stranger,' said he, 'one of them durned niggers of mine broke loose and got in the swamps, while I was at meeting this morning! Couldn't you take your dog, here, and give 'em a run? I just gave nine hundred dollars for that fellow, cash down.'

'Ho, what you going to him for?' said Jim Stokes, a short, porsy, vulgar-looking individual, dressed in a hunting shirt of blue Kentucky jean, who just then came up. 'Why, durn me, his dogs an't no breed 'tall! Mine's the true grit, I can tell you they's the true Florida blood-hounds! I's seen one of them ar dogs shake a nigger in his mouth like he'd been a sponge.'

Poor Ben's new-found religion could not withstand this sudden attack of his spiritual enemy; and rousing himself, notwithstanding the appealing glances of his wife, he stripped up his sleeves, and, squaring off, challenged his rival to a fight. A crowd gathered round, laughing, and betting, and cheering on the combatants with slang oaths and expressions, such as we will not repeat, when the concourse was routed by the approach of father Bonnie on the outside of the ring.

'Look here, boys, what works of the devil have you got round here? None of this on the camp-ground! 'This is the Lord's ground, here; so shut up your swearing, and don't fight.'

A confused murmur of voices now began to explain to father Bonnie the cause of the trouble.

'Ho, ho!' said he, 'let the nigger run; you can catch him fast enough when the meetings are over. You come here to 'tend to your salvation. Ah, don't you be swearing and blustering round! Come, boys, join in a hymn with me;' so saying he struck up a well-known air:

"When Israel went to Jericho, O, good Lord, in my soul!"

In which one after another joined, and the rising tumult was soon assuaged.

'I say,' said father Bonnie to the trader, in an under tone, as he was walking away, 'you got a good cook in your lot, hey?'

'Got a prime one,' said the trader; 'a number one cook, and no mistake! Picked her up real cheap, and I'll let you have her for eight hundred dollars, being, as you are, a minister.'

'You must think the gospel a better trade than it is,' said father Bonnie, 'if you think a minister can afford to pay at that figure.'

'Why,' said the trader, 'you haven't seen her; it's dirt cheap for her, I can tell you. A sound, strong, hearty woman; a prudent, careful housekeeper; a real pious Methodist, a member of a class-meeting. Why, eight hundred dollars ain't anything! I ought to get a thousand for her; but I don't hear preaching for nothing—always think right to make a discount to ministers.'

'Why couldn't you bring her in?' said father Bonnie. 'Maybe I'll give you seven hundred and fifty for her.'

'Couldn't do that, no way,' said the trader. 'Couldn't, indeed!'

'Well, after the meetings are over I'll talk about it.'

'She's got a child four years old,' said the trader, with a little cough; 'healthy, likely child; I suppose I shall want a hundred dollars for him.'

'Oh, that won't do,' said father Bonnie. 'I don't want any more children round my place than I've got now.'

'But I tell you,' said the trader, 'it's a likely boy. Why, the keeping of him won't cost you anything, and before you think of it you'll have a thousand-dollar hand grown on your own place.'

'Well,' said father Bonnie, 'I'll think of it.'

In the evening the scene on the camp-ground was still more picturesque and impressive. Those who conduct camp-meetings are generally men who, without much reasoning upon the subject, fall into a sort of tact in influencing masses of mind, and pressing into the service all the great life forces and influences of nature. A kind of rude poetry pervades their minds, colors their dialect, and influences their arrangements. The solemn and harmonious grandeur of night, with all its mysterious power of exalting the passions, and intensifying the emotions, has ever been appreciated and used by them with even poetic skill.

The day had been a glorious one in June; the sky of that firm clear blue, the atmosphere of that crystalline clearness which often gives to the American landscape such a sharply-defined outline; and to the human system such an intense consciousness of life. The evening sun went down in a broad sea of light, and even after it had sunk below the purple horizon, flashed back a flood of tremulous rose-coloured radiance, which, taken up by a thousand filmy clouds, made the whole sky above like a glowing tent of the most ethereal brightness. The shadows of the forest aisles were pierced by the rose-coloured rays, and as they gradually faded, star after star twinkled out, and a broad moon, ample and round, rose in the purple zone of the sky. When she had risen above the horizon but a short space, her light was so resplendent and so profuse, that it was decided to conduct the evening service by that alone; and when, at the sound of the hymn, the assembly poured in and arranged themselves before the preaching-stand, it is probable that the rudest heart present was somewhat impressed with the silent magnificence by which God was speaking to them through his works. As the hymn closed, father Bonnie, advancing to the front of the stage, lifted his hands, and pointed to the purple sky, and in a deep and not unmelodious voice repeated the words of the psalmist—'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handywork; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.' 'O, ye sinners!' he exclaimed, 'look up at the moon, there, walking in her brightness, and think over your oaths, and your cursings, and your drinking! Think over your backbitings and your cheatings! Think over your quarrellings and your fightings! How do they look to you now, with that blessed moon shining down upon you? Don't you see the beauty of our Lord God upon her? Don't you see how the saints walk in white with the Lord, like her? I dare say some of you, now, have had a pious mother, or a pious wife, or a pious sister, that's gone to glory, and there they are walking with the Lord—walking with the Lord through the sky, and looking down on you, sinners, just as that moon looks down! And what does she see you doing, your wife, or your mother, or your sister that's in glory? Does she see all your swearings, and your drinkings, and your fightings, and your hankerings after money, and your horse-racings, and your cock-fightings? O, sinners, but you are a bad set! I tell you the Lord is looking down now on you out of that moon! He is looking down in mercy! But I tell you he'll look down quite another way one of these days! O, there'll be a time of wrath by and by, if you don't repent! O, what a time there was at Sinai years ago, when the voice of the trumpet waxed louder and louder, and the mountain was all of a smoke, and there were thunderings and lightnings, and the Lord descended on Sinai. That's nothing to what you'll see by and by. No more moon looking down on you! No more stars, but the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat! Ah! did you ever see a fire in the woods? I have, and I've seen a fire on the prairies, and it rolled like a tempest, and men, and horses, and everything had to run before it. I have seen it roaring and crackling through the woods, and great trees shrivelled in a minute like tinder! I have seen it flash over trees seventy-five and a hundred feet high, and in a minute they'd be standing pillars of fire, and the heavens were all in a blaze, and the crackling and roaring was like the sea in a storm. There's a judgment-day for you! O, sinner, what will become of you in that day? Never cry, Lord! Lord! Too late, too late, man! You wouldn't take mercy when it was offered, and now you shall have wrath! No place to hide! The heaven and earth are passing away, and there shall be no more sea! There's no place for you now in God's universe.'

By this time there were tumultuous responses from the audience, of groans, cries, clapping of hands, and mingled shouts of glory and amen! The electric shout of the multitude acted on the preacher again, as he went on with a yet fiercer energy.

'Now is your time, sinners, now is your time! Come unto the altar, and God's people will pray for you! Now is the day of grace! Come up! Come up, you that have got pious fathers and mothers in glory! Come, up father! Come up, mother! Come up, brother! Come up, young man; we want you to come! Ah! there's a hardened sinner off there! I see his lofty looks! Come up, come up! Come up, you rich sinners; you'll be poor enough in the day of the Lord, I can tell you! Come up, you young women: you daughters of Jerusalem, with your tinkling ornaments! Come, saints of the Lord, and labour with me in prayer. Strike up a hymn, brethren, strike up the hymn! And a thousand voices commenced the hymn—

"Stop, poor sinner, stop and think,
Before you further go."

And, meanwhile, ministers and elders moved round the throng, entreating and urging one and another to come and kneel before the stand. Multitudes rushed forward; groans and sobs were heard as the speaker continued with redoubled vehemence.

'I don't care,' said Mr. John Gordon, 'who sees me. I'm going up. I am a poor old sinner, and I ought to be prayed for, if anybody.'

Nina shrank back and clung to Clayton's arm. So vehement was the surging feeling of the throng around her, that she wept with a wild, tremulous excitement. 'Do take me out; its dreadful!' she said. Clayton passed his arm around her, and, opening a way through the crowd, carried her out beyond the limits, where they stood together alone under the trees.

'I know I'm not good, as I ought to be,' she said; 'but I don't know how to be any better. Do you think it would do me any good to go up there? Do you believe in these things?'

'I sympathise with every effort that man makes to approach his Maker,' said Clayton; 'these ways do not suit me, but I dare not judge them. I cannot despise them. I must not make myself a rule for others.'

'But don't you think,' said Nina, 'that these things do harm sometimes?'

'Alas, child! what form of religion does not? It is our fatality that everything that does good must do harm. It's the condition of our poor imperfect life here.'

'I do not like these terrible threats,' said Nina. 'Can fear of fire make me love? Besides, I have a kind of courage in me that always rises up against a threat. It isn't my nature to fear.'

'If we may judge our Father by his voice in nature,' said Clayton, 'He deems severity a necessary part of our training. How inflexibly and terribly regular are all his laws! Fire and hail, snow and vapour, stormy wind fulfilling his word. All these have a crushing regularity in their movements, which show that he is to be feared as well as loved.'

'But I want to be religious,' said Nina, 'entirely apart from such considerations. Not driven by fear, but drawn by love. You can guide me about these things, for you are religious.'

'I fear I should not be accepted as such in any church,' said Clayton. 'It is my misfortune that I cannot receive any common form of faith, though I respect and sympathize with all. Generally speaking, preaching only weakens my faith; and I have to forget the sermon in order to recover my faith. I do not believe—I know that our moral nature needs a thorough regeneration; and I believe this must come through Christ. This is all I am certain of.'

'I wish I were more like Milly,' said Nina. 'She is a Christian I know; but she has come to it by dreadful sorrows. Sometimes I'm afraid to ask my heavenly Father to make me good, because I think it will come by dreadful trials if he does.'

'And I,' said Clayton, speaking with great earnestness, 'would be willing to suffer anything conceivable, if I could only overcome all evil, and come up to my highest ideas of good.' And, as he spoke, he turned his face up to the moonlight with an earnest fervour of expression that struck Nina deeply.

'I almost shudder to hear you say so! You don't know what it may bring on you!'

He looked at her with a beautiful smile, which was a peculiar expression of his face in moments of high excitement. 'I say it gain!' he said. 'Whatever it involves, let it come!'

* * * * *

The exercises of the evening went on with a succession of addresses, varied by singing of hymns and prayers. In the latter part of the time many declared themselves converts, and were shouting loudly. Father Bonnie came forward: 'Brethren,' he shouted, 'we are seeing a day from the Lord! we've got a glorious time! O brethren, let us sing,

"Glory to the Lord!
The Lord is coming among us!"

The excitement now became general. There was a confused sound of exhortation, prayers, and hymns, all mixed together, from different parts of the ground. But, all of a sudden, every one was startled by a sound which seemed to come pealing down directly from the thick canopy of pines over the heads of the ministers. 'Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! To what end shall it be for you. The day of the Lord shall be darkness, and not light! Blow ye the trumpet in Zion! Sound an alarm in my holy mountain! Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble! for the day of the Lord cometh!'

There was a deep sonorous power in the voice that spoke, and the words fell pealing down through the air like the vibrations of some mighty bell. Men looked confusedly on each other; but in the universal license of the hour, the obscurity of the night, and the multitude of the speakers, no one knew exactly whence it came. After a moment's pause, the singers were recommencing, when again the same deep voice was heard. 'Take away from me the noise of thy songs, and the melody of thy viols; for I will not hear them, saith the Lord. I hate and despise your feast-days! I will not smell in your solemn assemblies; for your hands are defiled with blood, and your fingers are greedy for violence! Will ye kill, and steal, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and come and stand before me? saith the Lord. Ye oppress the poor and needy, and hunt the stranger; also in thy skirts is found the blood of poor innocents! and yet ye say, "Because I am clean shall his anger pass from me!" Hear this, ye that swallow up the needy, and make the poor of the land to fail, saying, "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? that we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes." The Lord hath sworn, saying, "I will never forget their works. I will surely visit you!"'

The audience, thus taken, in the obscurity of the evening, by an unknown speaker, whose words seemed to fall apparently from the clouds, in a voice of such strange and singular quality, began to feel a creeping awe stealing over them. The high state of electrical excitement under which they had been going on, pre-disposed them to a sort of revulsion of terror; and a vague, mysterious panic crept upon them, as the boding, mournful voice continued to peal from the trees. 'Hear, O ye rebellious people! The Lord is against this nation! The Lord shall stretch out upon the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness! For thou saidst, I will ascend into the stars, I will be as God! But thou shalt be cast out as an abominable branch, and the wild beasts shall tread thee down! Howl, fir-tree, for thou art spoiled! Open thy doors, oh Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars! For the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the land! The Lord shall utter his voice before his army, for his camp is very great! Multitudes, multitudes, in the valley of decision! For the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision! The sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars withdraw their shining, for the Lord shall utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and earth shall shake! In that day I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and darken the whole earth! And I will turn your feasts into mourning, and your songs into lamentations! Woe to the bloody city! It is full of lies and robbery. The noise of a whip—the noise of the rattling of wheels—of the prancing horses, and the jumping chariot! The horseman lifteth up the sword and glittering spear and there is a multitude of slain! There is no end of their corpses! They are stumbling upon the corpses! For, behold, I am against thee, saith the Lord, and I will make thee utterly desolate!

There was a fierce, wailing earnestness in the sound of these dreadful words, as if they were uttered in a paroxysm of affright and horror, by one who stood face to face with some tremendous doom. And, when the sound ceased, men drew in their breath, and looked on each other, and the crowd began slowly to disperse, whispering in low voices to each other. So extremely piercing and so wildly earnest had the voice been, that it actually seemed, in the expressive words of Scripture, to make every ear to tingle. And, as people of rude and primitive habits are always predisposed to superstition, there crept through the different groups wild legends of prophets strangely commissioned to announce coming misfortunes. Some spoke of the predictions of the judgment-day; some talked of comets, and strange signs that had preceded wars and pestilences. The ministers wondered, and searched around the stand in vain. One auditor alone, could, had he desired it, make an explanation. Hurry, who stood near the stand, had recognized the voice. But though he searched, also, around, he could find no one. He who spoke was one whose savage familiarity with nature gave him the agility and stealthy adroitness of a wild animal. And during the stir and commotion of the dispersing audience, he had silently made his way from tree to tree, over the very heads of those who were yet wondering at his strange, boding words, till at last he descended in a distant part of the forest.

After the service, as father Dickson was preparing to retire to his tent, a man pulled him by the sleeve. It was the Georgia trader. 'We have had an awful time, to-night!' said he, looking actually pale with terror. 'Do you think the judgment-day really is coming?'

'My friend,' said father Dickson, 'it surely is! Every step we take in life is leading us directly to the judgment-seat of Christ!'

'Well,' said the trader, 'but do you think that was from the Lord, that last one that spoke? Durned if he didn't say awful things—'nough to make the hair rise! I tell you what, I've often had doubts about my trade. The ministers may prove it's all right out of the Old Testament; but I'm durned if I think they know all the things that we do. But, then, I an't so bad as some of 'em. But, now, I've got a gal out in my gang that's dreadful sick, and I partly promised her I'd bring a minister to see her.'

'I'll go with you, friend,' said father Dickson; and forthwith he began following the trader to the racks where their horses were tied. Selecting out of some hundred who were tied there, their own beasts, the two midnight travellers soon found themselves trotting along under the shadow of the forest boughs.

'My friend,' said father Dickson, 'I feel bound in conscience to tell you, that I think your trade a ruinous one to your soul. I hope you'll lay to heart the solemn warning you've heard to-night. Why, your own sense can show you that a trade can't be right, that you'd be afraid to be found in if the great judgment-day were at hand.'

'Well, I rather 'spect you speak the truth; but, then, what makes father Bonnie stand up for it?'

'My friend, I must say that I think father Bonnie upholds a soul-destroying error: I must say that, as conscience bound, I pray the Lord for him and you too. I put it right to your conscience, my friend, whether you think you could keep to your trade, and live a Christian life?'

'No; the fact is, it's a d——d bad business, that's just where 'tis. We an't fit to be trusted with such things that come to us—gals and women. Well, I feel pretty bad, I tell you, to-night; 'cause I know I haven't done, right by this yer gal. I ought fur to have let her alone; but, then, the devil or, something possessed me. And now she has got a fever, and screeches awfully. I declare, some things she says go right through me!

Father Dickson groaned in spirit over this account, and felt himself almost guilty for belonging, ostensibly and outwardly, to a church which tolerated such evils. He rode along by the side of his companion, breaking forth into occasional ejaculations and snatches of hymns. After a ride of about an hour, they arrived at the encampment. A large fire had been made in a cleared spot, and smouldering fragments and brands were lying among the white ashes. One or two horses were tied to a neighboring tree, and wagons were drawn up by them. Around the fire, in different groups, lay about fifteen men and women, with heavy iron shackles on their feet, asleep in the moonlight. At a little distance from the group, and near to one of the wagons, a blanket was spread down on the ground, under a tree, on which lay a young girl of seventeen, tossing and moaning in a disturbed stupor.* A respectable-looking mulatto woman was sitting beside her, with a gourd full of water, with which from time to time she moistened her forehead. The woman rose as the trader came up.

'Well, Nance, how does she do now?' said the trader.

'Mis'able enough,' said Nance: 'she done been tossing, 'a' throwing round, and crying for her mammy, ever since you went away!'

'Well, I've brought the minister,' said he. 'Try, Nance, to wake her up; she'll be glad to see him.'

The woman knelt down, and took the hand of the sleeper. 'Emily! Emily!' she said, 'wake up.'

The girl threw herself over with a sudden, restless toss. 'O, how my head burns! O, dear! O, my mother!—mother!—mother!—mother!—why don't you come to me.'

Father Dickson approached and knelt the other side of her. The mulatto woman made another effort to bring her to consciousness. 'Emily, here's the minister you was wanting so much! Emily, wake up!'

The girl slowly opened her eyes—large, tremulous, dark eyes. She drew her hand across them, as if to clear her sight, and looked wistfully at the woman. 'Minister!—minister!' she said.

'Yes, minister; you said you wanted to see one.'

'O, yes, I did!' she said heavily.

'My daughter!' said father Dickson, 'you are very sick.'

* See the story of Emily Russel in the "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin."

'Yes,' she said, 'very; and I'm glad of it! I'm going to die! I'm glad of that too! That's all I've got left to be glad of! But I wanted to ask you to write to my mother. She is a free woman. she lives in New York. I want you to give my love to her, and tell her not to worry any more. Tell her I tried all I could to get to her; but they took us; and mistress was so angry she sold me! I forgive her, too. I don't bear her any malice, 'cause it's all over, now. She used to say I was a wild girl, and laughed too loud. I shan't trouble any one that way any more! so that's no matter!'

The girl spoke these sentences at long intervals, occasionally opening her eyes and closing them again in a languid manner. Father Dickson, however, who had some knowledge of medicine, placed his finger on her pulse, which was rapidly sinking. It is the usual instinct, in all such cases, to think of means of prolonging life. Father Dickson rose, and said to the trader: 'Unless some stimulus be given her, she will be gone very soon.' The trader produced from his pocket a flask of brandy, which he mixed with a little water in a cup, and placed it in father Dickson's hand. He kneeled down again, and calling her by name, tried to make her take some.

'What is it?' she said, opening her wild glittering eyes.

'It's something to make you feel better.'

'I don't want to feel better! I want to die!' she said, throwing herself over. 'What should I want to live for?'

What should she? The words struck father Dickson so much, that he sat for a while in silence. He meditated in his mind how he could reach, with any words, that dying ear, or enter with her into that land of trance and mist, into whose cloudy circle the soul seemed already to have passed. Guided by a subtle instinct, he seated himself by the dying girl, and began singing in a subdued, plaintive air, the following well-known hymn,—

"Hark my soul! it is the Lord,
 'Tis thy Saviour, hear his word;
 Jesus speaks, he speaks to thee;
 Say, poor sinner, lov'st thou me?"

The melody is one often sung among the negroes; and one which, from its tenderness and pathos, is a favorite among them. As oil will find its way into crevices where water cannot penetrate, so song will find its way where speech can no longer enter. The moon shone full on the face of the dying girl, only interrupted by flickering shadows of leaves; and as father Dickson sung, he fancied he saw a slight, tremulous movement of the face, as if the soul, so worn and weary, were up-borne on the tender pinions of the song. He went on singing—

“Can a mother’s tender care
Cease toward the child she bare?
Yes, she may forgetful be:
Still will I remember thee.”

By the light of the moon, he saw a tear steal from under the long lashes, and course slowly down her cheek. He continued his song:—

“Mine is an eternal love,
Higher than the heights above,
Deeper than the depths beneath,
True and faithful, strong as death.

“Thou shalt see my glory soon,
When the work of faith is done;
Partner of my throne shalt be!
Say, poor sinner, lov’st thou me?”

O love of Christ! which no sin can weary, which no lapse of time can change! from which tribulation, persecution, and distress cannot separate—all-redeeming, all-glorifying, changing even death and despair to the gate of heaven! Thou hast one more triumph here in the wilderness, in the slave-coffle, and thou comest to bind up the broken-hearted. As the song ceased, she opened her eyes.

‘Mother used to sing that,’ she said.

‘And can you believe in it, daughter?’

‘Yes,’ she said, ‘I see Him now. He loves me. Let me go!’

There followed a few moments of those strugglings and shiverings which are the birth-pangs of another life, and Emily lay at rest. Father Dickson, kneeling by her side, poured out the fulness of his heart in an earnest prayer. Rising, he went up to the trader, and taking his hand, said to him—

‘My friend, this may be the turning point with your soul for eternity. It has pleased the Lord to show you the evil of your ways; and now my advice to you is, break off your sins at once, and do works meet for repentance. Take off the shackles of these poor creatures, and tell them they are at liberty to go.

‘Why, bless your soul, sir! this yer lot’s worth ten thousand dollars!’ said the trader, who was not prepared for so close a practical application.

Do not be too sure, friend, that the trader is peculiar in this. The very same argument, though less frankly stated, holds in the bonds of Satan many extremely well-bred, refined, respectable men, who would gladly save their souls, if they could afford the luxury.

'My friend,' said father Dickson, using the words of a very close and uncompromising preacher of old, 'what shall it profit a man if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?'

'I know that,' said the trader, doubtfully; 'but it's a very hard case this. I'll think about it, though. But there's father Bonnie wants to buy Nance. It would be a pity to disappoint him. But I'll think it over.'

Father Dickson returned to the camp-ground between one and two o'clock at night, and putting away his horse, took his way to the ministers' tent. Here he found father Bonnie standing out in the moonlight. He had been asleep within the tent; but it is to be confessed that the interior of a crowded tent on a camp-ground is anything but favourable to repose. He therefore came out into the fresh air, and was there when father Dickson came back to enter the tent.

'Well, brother, where have you been so late?' said father Bonnie.

'I have been looking for a few sheep in the wilderness, whom everybody neglects,' said father Dickson. And then in a tone tremulous from agitation, he related to him the scene he had just witnessed. 'Do you see,' he said, 'brother, what iniquities you are countenancing? Now, here, right next to our camp, a slave-coffe encamped! Men and women guilty of no crime, driven in fetters through our land, slaming us in the sight of every Christian nation! What horrible, abominable iniquities are these poor traders tempted to commit! What perfect hells are the great trading-houses, where men, women, and children are made merchandise of, and where no light of the gospel ever enters! And when this poor trader is convicted of sin, and wants to enter into the kingdom, you stand there to apologize for his sins! Brother Bonnie, I much fear you are the stumbling-block over which souls will stumble into hell. I don't think you believe your argument from the Old Testament yourself. You must see that it has no kind of relation to such slavery as we have in this country. There's an awful Scripture which saith: "He feedeth on ashes; a deceived heart hath turned him aside, so that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?"'

The earnestness with which father Dickson spoke, combined with the reverence commonly entertained for his piety, gave great force to his words. The reader will not therefore wonder to hear that father Bonnie, impulsive and easily moved as he was, wept at the account, and was moved by the exhortation. Nor will he be surprised to learn that, two weeks after, father Bonnie drove a brisk bargain with the same trader for three new hands. The trader had discovered that the judgment day was not coming yet awhile; and father Bonnie satisfied himself that Noah, when he awoke from his wine said, 'Cursed be Canaan.'

* * * * *

We have one scene more to draw before we dismiss the auditors of the camp-meeting. At a late hour the Gordon carriage was winding its way under the silent, chequered, woodland path. Harry, who came slowly on a horse behind, felt a hand laid on his bridle. With a sudden start, he stopped.

'Oh, Dred, is it you? How dared you—how could you be so imprudent? How dared you come here, when you know you risked your life?'

'Life!' said the other, 'what is life? He that loveth his life shall lose it. Besides, the Lord said unto me, Go. The Lord is with me as a mighty and terrible one. Harry, did you mark those men? Hunters of men, their hands red with the blood of the poor, all seeking unto the Lord! Ministers who buy and sell us! Is this a people prepared for the Lord? I left a man dead in the swamps, whom their dogs have torn. His wife is a widow—his children orphans! They eat and wipe their mouth, and say, "What have I done? The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we."'

'I know it,' said Harry, gloomily.

'And you join yourself unto them?'

'Don't speak to me more about that. I won't betray you, but I won't consent to have blood shed. My mistress is my sister.'

'Oh, yes, to be sure. They read Scripture, don't they? Cast out the children of the bond-woman? That's Scripture for them?'

'Dred,' said Harry, 'I love her better than I love myself. I will fight for her to the last, but never against her, or hers.'

'And you will serve Tom Gordon?' said Dred.

'Never!' said Harry.

Dred stood still a moment. Through an opening among the branches the moonbeams streamed down on his wild dark figure. Harry remarked his eye fixed before him on vacancy, the pupil swelling out in glassy fulness, with a fixed somnambule stare. After a moment he spoke, in a hollow altered voice, like that of a sleep-walker—

‘Then shall the silver cord be loosed, and the golden bowl be broken. Yes, cover up the grave—cover it up. Now, hurry—come to me, or he will take thy wife for a prey.’

‘Dred, what do you mean?’ said Harry. ‘What’s the matter?’

He shook him by the shoulders. Dred rubbed his eyes, and stared on Henry.

‘I must go back,’ he said, ‘to my den. Foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, and in the habitations of dragons the Lord hath opened a way for his outcasts!’

He plunged into the thickets, and was gone.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LIFE IN THE SWAMPS.

OUR readers will perhaps feel an interest to turn back with us and follow the singular wanderings of the mysterious personage, whose wild denunciations had so disturbed the minds of the worshippers at the camp-meeting. There is a twilight-ground between the boundaries of the sane and insane, which the old Greeks and Romans regarded with a peculiar veneration. They held a person whose faculties were thus darkened as walking under the awful shadow of a supernatural presence; and, as the mysterious secrets of the stars only become visible in the night, so in these eclipses of the more material faculties they held there was often an awakening of supernatural perceptions. The hot and positive light of our modern materialism, which exhales from the growth of our existence every dew-drop, which searches out and dries every rivulet of romance, which sends an unsparing beam into every cool grotto of poetic possibility, withering the moss, and turning the dropping cave to a dusty den; this spirit, so remorseless, allows us no such indefinite land. There are but two words in the whole department of modern anthropology—the sane and the insane; the latter dismissed from human reckoning almost with contempt.

We should find it difficult to give a suitable name to the strange and abnormal condition in which this singular being, of whom we are speaking, passed the most of his time. It was a state of exaltation and trance, which yet appeared not at all to impede the exercise of his outward and physical faculties, but rather to give them a preternatural keenness and intensity, such as sometimes attends the more completely-developed phenomena of somnambulism. In regard to his physical system there was also much that was peculiar.

Our readers may imagine a human body of the largest and keenest vitality to grow up so completely under the nursing influences of nature, that it may seem to be as perfectly en rapport with them as a tree; so that the rains, the wind, and the thunder, all those forces from which human beings generally seek shelter, seem to hold with it a kind of fellowship, and to be familiar companions of existence. Such was the case with Dred. So completely had he come into sympathy and communion with nature, and with those forms of it which more particularly surrounded him in the swamps, that he moved about among them with as much ease as a lady treads her Turkey carpet. What would seem to us in recital to be incredible hardship, was to him but an ordinary condition of existence. To walk knee-deep in the spongy soil of the swamp, to force his way through thickets, to lie all night sinking in the porous soil, or to crouch like the alligator among reeds and rushes, were to him situations of as much comfort as well-curtained beds and pillows are to us. It is not to be denied that there is in this savage perfection of the natural organs a keen and almost fierce delight, which must excel the softest seductions of luxury. Anybody who has ever watched the eager zest with which the hunting-dog plunges through the woods, darts through the thicket, or dives into water, in an ecstasy of enjoyment, sees something of what such vital force must be.

Dred was under the inspiring belief that he was the subject of visions and supernatural communications. The African race are said by mesmerists to possess, in the fullest degree, that peculiar temperament which fits them for the evolution of mesmeric phenomena, and hence the existence among them to this day of men and women who are supposed to have peculiar magical powers. The grandfather of Dred, on his mother's side, had been one of these reputed African sorcerers, and he had early discovered in the boy this peculiar species of temperament. He had taught him the secret of snake-charming, and had possessed his mind from childhood with expectations of prophetic and supernatural impulses. That mysterious and singular gift, whatever it may be, which Highland seers denominate second sight, is a very common tradition among the negroes, and there are not wanting thousands of reputed instances among them to confirm belief in it. What this faculty may be we shall not pretend to say. Whether there be in the soul a yet undeveloped attribute, which is to be to the future what memory is to the past; or whether in some individuals an extremely high and perfect condition of the sensuous organization endows them with something of that certainty of instinctive discrimination which belongs to animals, are things which we shall not venture to decide upon. It was, however, an absolute fact with regard to Dred, that he had often escaped danger by means of a peculiarity of this kind. He had been warned from particular places where the hunters had lain in wait for him; had foreseen in times of want where game might be ensnared, and received intimations where persons were to be found in whom he might safely confide; and his predictions with regard to persons and things had often chanced to be so strikingly true, as to invest his sayings with a singular awe and importance among his associates. It was a remarkable fact, but one not peculiar to this case, that the mysterious exaltation of mind in this individual seemed to run parallel with the current of shrewd, practical sense, and, like a man who converses alternately in two languages, he would speak now the language of exaltation, and now that of common life interchangeably. This peculiarity imparted a singular and grotesque effect to his whole personality.

On the night of the camp-meeting he was, as we have already seen, in a state of the highest ecstasy. The wanton murder of his associate seemed to flood his soul with an awful tide of emotion, as a thunder-cloud is filled and shaken by slow-gathering electricity. And, although the distance from his retreat to the camp-ground was nearly fifteen miles, most of it through what seemed to be impassable swamps, yet he performed it with as little consciousness of fatigue as if he had been a spirit. Even had he been perceived at that time it is probable that he could no more have been taken, or bound, than the demoniac of Gadara. After he parted from Harry he pursued his way to the interior of the swamp, as was his usual habit, repeating to himself, in a chanting voice, such words of prophetic writ as were familiar to him.

The day had been sultry, and it was now an hour or two past midnight, when a thunder-storm, which had long been gathering and muttering in the distant sky, began to develop its forces. A low, shivering sigh crept through the woods, and swayed in weird whistlings the tops of the pines; and sharp arrows of lightning came glittering down among the darkness of the branches as if sent from the bow of some warlike angel. An army of heavy clouds swept in a moment across the moon; then came a broad, dazzling, blinding sheet of flame concentrating itself on the top of a tall pine near where Dred was standing, and in a moment shivering all its branches to the ground, as a child strips the leaves from the twig.

Dred clapped his hands with a fierce delight, and while the rain and wind were howling and hissing around him, he shouted aloud 'Wake, O arm of the Lord! Awake, put on thy strength! The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon! The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire! The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh! Hailstones and coals of fire.'

The storm which howled around him bent the forest like a reed, and large trees, uprooted from the spongy and tremulous soil, fell crashing with a tremendous noise; but, as if he had been a dark spirit of the tempest, he shouted and exulted. The perception of such awful power seemed to animate him, and yet to excite in his soul an impatience that He whose power was so infinite did not awake to judgment.

'Rend the heavens!' he cried, 'and come down! Avenge the innocent blood! Cast forth thine arrows and slay them! Shoot out thy lightnings and discomfort them.'

His soul seemed to kindle with almost a fierce impatience at the toleration of that Almighty Being, who, having the power to blast and to burn, so silently endures.

Could Dred have possessed himself of those lightnings what would have stood before him? But his cry, like the cry of thousands, only went up to stand in waiting till an awful coming day! Gradually the storm passed by, the big drops dashed less and less frequently; a softer breeze passed through the forest, with a patter like the clapping of a thousand little wings, and the moon occasionally looked over the silvery battlements of the great clouds.

As Dred was starting to go forward, one of those clear revelations showed him the cowering form of a man, crouched at the root of a tree a few paces in front of him. He was evidently a fugitive, and, in fact, was the one of whose escape to the swamps the Georgia trader had complained on the day of the meeting.

'Who is here, at this time of night?' said Dred, coming up to him.

'I have lost my way,' said the other; 'I don't know where I am!'

'A runaway?' inquired Dred.

'Don't betray me!' said the other, apprehensively.

'Betray you! would I do that?' said Dred. 'How did you get into the swamp?'

'I got away from a soul-driver's camp that was taking us on through the states.'

'Oh, oh!' said Dred, 'camp-meeting and driver's camp right alongside of each other! Shepherds that sell the flock and pick the bones! Well, come, old man, I'll take you home with me.'

'I'm pretty much beat out,' said the man, 'it's been up over my knees every step, and I didn't know but they'd set the dogs after me. If they do I'll let 'em kill me and done with it, for I'm 'bout ready to have it over with. I got free once, and got clear up to New York, and got me a little bit of a house, and a wife, and two children, with a little money beforehand. And then they nabbed me and sent me back again, and mas'r sold me to the drivers, and I believe I's 'bout as good's die. There's no use in trying to live, everything going agin a body so!'

'Die! No, indeed, you won't,' said Dred, 'not if I've got hold of you! Take heart, man, take heart! Before morning I'll put you where the dogs can't find you, nor anything else. Come, up with you!'

The man rose up, and made an effort to follow; but, wearied and unused as he was to the choked and perplexed way, he stumbled and fell almost every minute.

'How now, brother!' said Dred; 'this won't do. I must put you over my shoulder, as I have many a buck before now.'

And suiting the action to the word, he put the man on his back, and, bidding him hold fast to him, went on picking his way as if he scarcely perceived his weight. It was now between two and three o'clock, and the clouds, gradually dispersing, allowed the full light of the moon to slide down here and there through the wet and shivering foliage. No sound was heard save the humming of insects and the crackling plunges by which Dred made his way forward.

'You must be pretty strong,' said his companion. 'Have you been in the swamps long?'

'Yes,' said the other, 'I have been a wild man. Every man's hand against me—a companion of the dragons and the owls this many a year. I have made my bed with the leviathan, among the reeds and the rushes. I have found the alligators and the snakes better neighbours than Christians. They let those alone that let them alone, but Christians will hunt for the precious life.'

After about an hour of steady travelling, Dred arrived at the outskirts of the island which we have described.. For about twenty paces before he reached it, he waded waist-deep in water. Creeping out at last, and telling the other one to follow him, he began carefully coursing along on his hands and knees, giving at the same time a long, shrill, peculiar whistle. It was responded to by a similar sound, which seemed to proceed through the bushes. After a while, a crackling noise was heard, as of some animal, which gradually seemed to come nearer and nearer to them, till finally a large water-dog emerged from the underbrush, and began testifying his joy at the arrival of the new comer by most extravagant gambols.

'So, ho, Buck! quiet, my boy!' said Dred. 'Show us the way in.'

The dog, as if understanding the words, immediately turned into the thicket, and Dred and his companion followed him on their hands and knees. The path wound up and down the brushwood, through many sharp turnings, till at last it ceased altogether at the roots of a tree; and while the dog disappeared among the brushwood, Dred climbed the tree, and directed his companion to follow him; and proceeding out on to one of the longest limbs, he sprang nimbly on to the ground in the cleared space which we have before described. His wife was standing waiting for him, and threw herself upon him with a cry of joy.

'Oh, you've come back! I thought sure enough dey'd got you dis time!'

'Not yet. I must continue till the opening of the seals—till the vision cometh. Have ye buried him?'

'No. There's a grave dug down yonder, and he's been carried there.'

'Come, then,' said Dred.

At a distant part of the clearing was a blasted cedar tree, all whose natural foliage had perished. But it was veiled from head to foot in long wreaths of the tillandsia, the parasitic moss of these regions, and, in the dim light of the approaching dawn, might have formed no unapt resemblance to a gigantic spectre dressed in mourning weeds. Beneath this tree Dred had interred, from time to time, the bodies of fugitives which he found dead in the swamps, attaching to this disposition of them some peculiar superstitious idea. The widow of the dead, the wife of Dred, and the new comer, were now gathered around the shallow grave; for the soil was such as scarcely gave room to make a place deep enough for a grave without its becoming filled with water. The dawn was just commencing a dim foreshadowing in the sky. The moon and stars were still shining. Dred stood and looked up, and spoke in a solemn voice :—

‘Seek him that maketh Arcturus and Orion—that turneth the shadow of death into morning. Behold those lights in the sky—the lights in his hands pierced for the sins of the world, and spread forth as on a cross. But the day shall come that he shall lay down the yoke, and he will bear the sin of the world no longer. Then shall come the great judgment. He will lay righteousness to the line, and judgment to the plummet, and the hail shall sweep away the refugees of lies.’

He stooped, and lifting the body, laid it in the grave; and at this moment the wife broke into a loud lament.

‘Hush, woman!’ said Dred, raising his hand. ‘Weep ye not for the dead, neither bewail him; but weep ye sore for the living. He must lie till the rest of his brethren be killed, for the vision is sealed up for an appointed time. If it tarry, wait for it. It shall surely come, and shall not tarry.’

CHAPTER XXV.

MORE SUMMER TALK.

A GLORIOUS morning, washed by the tears of last night’s shower, rose like a bride upon Canema. The rain-drops sparkled and winked from leaf to leaf, or fell in showery diamonds in the breeze. The breath of numberless roses, now in full bloom, rose in clouds to the windows. The breakfast-table, with its clean linen, glittering silver, and fragrant coffee, received the last evening’s participants of the camp-meeting in fresh morning spirits, ready to discuss, as an every-day affair, what the evening before they had felt too deeply perhaps to discuss. On the way home they had spoken of the scenes of the day, and wondered and speculated on the singular incident which closed it. But of all the dark circle of woe and crime, of all that valley of vision which was present to the mind of him who spoke, they were as practically ignorant as the dwellers of the curtained boudoirs of New York are of the fearful mysteries of the five points. The aristocratic nature of society at the south so completely segregates people of a certain position in life from any acquaintance with the movements of human nature in circles below them, that the most fearful things may be transacting in their vicinity, unknown or unnoticed. The horrors and sorrows of the slave-coffle were a sealed book to Nina and Anne Clayton. They had scarcely dreamed of them; and uncle John, if he knew of their existence, took very good care to keep out of their way, as he would turn from any other painful and disagreeable scene. All of them had heard something of negro-hunters, and regarded them as low, vulgar people, but troubled their heads little further on the subject; so that they would have been quite at a loss for the discovery of any national sins that could have appropriately drawn down the denunciations of Heaven. The serious thoughts and aspirations which might have risen in any of the company the evening before, assumed, with everything else, quite another light under the rays of morning. All of us must have had experience, in our own histories, of the great difference between the night and the morning view of the same subject. What we have thought and said in the august presence of witnessing stars, or beneath the holy shadows of moonlight, seems with the hot, dry light of next day's sun, to take wings and rise to heaven with the night's clear drops. If all the prayers and good resolutions which are laid down on sleeping pillows could be found there on awaking, the world would be better than it is. Of this uncle John Gordon had experience, as he sat himself down at the breakfast-table. The night before, he realised in some dim wise that he, Mr. John Gordon, was not merely a fat, elderly gentleman, in blue coat and white vest, whose great object in existence was to eat well, drink well, sleep well, wear clean linen, and keep out of the way of trouble. He had within him a tumult of yearnings and aspirings—uprisings of that great, life-long sleeper, which we call soul, and which, when it wakes, is an awfully clamorous, craving, exacting, troublesome inmate, and which is therefore generally got asleep again in the shortest time, by whatever opiates may come to hand. Last night, urged on by this troublesome guest, stimulated by the vague power of such awful words as judgment and eternity, he had gone out and knelt down as a mourner for sin and a seeker for salvation, both words standing for very true and awful facts; and this morning, although it was probably a more sensible and appropriate theme than most of the things he was in the habit of doing, he was almost ashamed of it. The question arose at table whether another excursion should be made to the camp-ground.

‘For my part,’ said aunt Maria, ‘I hope you will not go again, Mr. Gordon. I think you had better keep out of the way of such things. I really was vexed to see you in that rabble of such very common people.’

‘You’ll observe,’ said uncle John, ‘that when Mrs. G— goes to heaven, she’ll notify the Lord forthwith, that she has only been accustomed to the most select circles, and requests to be admitted at the front door.’

‘It isn’t because I object to being with common people,’ said Anne Clayton, ‘that I dislike this custom of going to the altar; but it seems to me an invasion of that privacy and reserve which belong to our most sacred feelings. Besides, there are in a crowd coarse, rude, disagreeable people, with whom it isn’t pleasant to come in contact.’

‘For my part,’ said Mrs. John Gordon, ‘I don’t believe in it at all. It’s a mere temporary excitement. People go and get wonderfully wrought up, come away, and are just what they were before.’

‘Well,’ said Clayton, ‘isn’t it better to be wrought up once in a while, than never to have any religious feelings? Isn’t it better to have a vivid impression of the vastness and worth of the soul—of the power of an endless life, for a few hours once a year, than never to feel it at all? The multitudes of those people there never hear or think a word of these things at any other time in their lives. For my part,’ he added, ‘I don’t see why it’s a thing to be ashamed of, if Mr. Gordon or I should have knelt at the altar last night, even if we do not feel like it this morning. We are too often ashamed of our better moments. I believe Protestant Christians are the only people on earth who are ashamed of the outward recognition of their religion. The Mahometan will prostrate himself in the street, or wherever he happens to be, when his hour for prayer comes. The Roman Catholic sailor or soldier kneels down at the sound of the vesper-bell. But we rather take pride in having it understood that we take our religion moderately and coolly, and that we are not going to put ourselves much out about it.

'Well, but brother,' said Anne, 'I will maintain still that there is a reserve about these things which belongs to the best Christians. And did not our Saviour tell us that our prayers and alms should be in secret?'

'I do not deny at all what you say, Anne,' said Clayton, 'but I think what I said is true, notwithstanding; and, both being true, of course in some way they must be consistent with each other.'

'I think,' said Nina, 'the sound of the singing at these camp-meetings is really quite spirit-stirring and exciting.'

'Yes,' said Clayton, 'these wild tunes and the hymns with which they are associated form a kind of forest liturgy, in which the feelings of thousands of hearts have been embodied. Some of the tunes seem to me to have been caught from the song of birds, or from the rushing of wind among the branches. They possess a peculiar rhythmical energy, well suited to express the vehement emotions of the masses. Did camp-meetings do no other good than to scatter among the people these hymns and tunes, I should consider them to be of inestimable value.'

'I must say,' said Anne, 'I always had a prejudice against that class both of hymns and tunes.'

'You misjudge them,' said Clayton, 'as you refined, cultivated women always do, who are brought up in the kid-slipper and carpet view of human life. But just imagine only the old Greek or Roman peasantry elevated to the level of one of these hymns. Take, for example, a verse of one I heard them sing last night:—

"The earth shall be dissolved like snow,
The sun shall cease to shine,
But God, who called me here below,
Shall be for ever mine."

What faith is there! What confidence in immortality! How could a man feel it and not be ennobled? Then, what a rough, hearty heroism was in that first hymn! It was right manly!

'Ah! but,' said Anne, 'half the time they sing them without the slightest perception of their meaning, or the least idea of being influenced by them.'

'And so do the worshippers in the sleepest and most aristocratic churches,' said Clayton. 'That's nothing peculiar to the camp-ground. But if it is true what a certain statesman once said, "Let me make the ballads of the people, and I care not who makes their laws," it is certainly a great gain to have such noble sentiments as many of these hymns contain circulating freely among the people.'

'What upon earth,' said uncle John, 'do you suppose that last fellow was about up in the clouds there? Nobody seemed to know where he was, or who he was, and I thought his discourse seemed to be rather an unexpected addition. He put it into us pretty strong, I thought! Declare, such a bundle of woes and curses I never heard distributed! Seemed to have done up all the old prophets into one bundle, and tumbled it down upon our heads! Some of them were quite superstitious about it, and began talking about warnings and all that.'

'Pooh!' said aunt Maria, 'the likelihood is that some itinerant poor preacher has fallen upon this trick for producing a sensation. There is no end to the trickeries and the got-up scenes in these camp-meetings just to produce effect. If I had had a pistol I should like to have fired into the tree, and see whether I couldn't have changed his tune.'

'It seemed to me,' said Clayton, 'from the little that I did hear, that there was some method in his madness. It was one of the most singular and impressive voices I ever heard; and, really, the enunciation of some of those latter things was tremendous. But then, in the universal license and general confusion of the scene, the thing was not so much to be wondered at. It would be the most natural thing in the world that some crazy fanatic should be heated almost to the point of insanity by the scene, and take this way of unburthening himself. Such excitements most generally assume the form of denunciation.'

'Well, now,' said Nina, 'to tell you the truth, I should like to go out again to-day. It's a lovely ride, and I like to be in the woods. And then, I like to walk around among the tents, and hear the people talk, and see all the different specimens of human nature that are there. I never saw such a gathering together in my life.'

'Agreed!' said uncle John. 'I'll go with you. After all, Clayton here has got the right of it when he says a fellow oughtn't to be ashamed of his religion, such as it is.'

'Such as it is, to be sure!' said aunt Maria sarcastically.

'Yes, I say again, such as it is!' said uncle John, bracing himself. 'I don't pretend it's much. We'll all of us bear to be a good deal better, without danger of being translated. Now, as to this being converted, hang me if I know how to get at it. I suppose that it is something like an electric shock,—if a fellow is going to get it he must go up to the machine!

‘Well!’ said Nina, ‘you do hear some queer things there. Don’t you remember that jolly, slashing-looking fellow whom they called Bill Dakin, that came up there with his two dogs? In the afternoon, after the regular service, we went to one of the tents where there was a very noisy prayer-meeting going on, and there was Bill Dakin, on his knees, with his hands clasped and the tears rolling down his cheeks; and father Bonnie was praying over him with all his might. And what do you think he said? He said, “O Lord, here’s Bill Dakin; he is converted, now take him right to heaven now he is ready, or he’ll be drunk again in two weeks!”’

‘Well!’ said Anne Clayton, tossing her head indignantly, ‘that’s blasphemy, in my opinion.’

‘Oh, perhaps not,’ said Clayton, ‘any more than the clownish talk of our servants is intentional rudeness.’

‘Well,’ said Anne, ‘don’t you think it shows a great want of perception?’

‘Certainly it does,’ said Clayton. ‘It shows great rudeness and coarseness of fibre, and is not at all to be commended. But still, we are not to judge of it by the rules of cultivated society. In well-trained minds every faculty keeps its due boundaries; but in this kind of wild-forest growth, mirthfulness will sometimes overgrow reverence, just as the yellow jessamine will completely smother a tree. A great many of the ordinances of the old Mosaic dispensation were intended to counteract this very tendency.’

‘Well,’ said Nina, ‘did you notice poor old Tiff, so intent upon getting his children converted? He did not seem to have the least thought or reference to getting into heaven himself. The only thing with him was to get those children in. Tiff seems to me just like those mistletoes that we see on the trees in the swamps. He don’t seem to have any root of his own; he seems to grow out of something else.’

‘Those children are very pretty-looking, genteel children,’ said Anne: ‘and how well they were dressed!’

‘My dear,’ said Nina, ‘Tiff prostrates himself at my shrine every time he meets me to implore my favourable supervision as to that point, and it really is diverting to hear him talk. The old

Caliban has an eye for colour, and a sense of what is suitable, equal to any French milliner, I assure you, my dear. I always was reputed for having a talent for dress, and Tiff appreciates me. Isn't it charming of him? I declare, when I see the old creature lugging about those children, I always think of an ugly old cactus with its blossoms. I believe he verily thinks they belong to him just as much. Their father is entirely dismissed from Tiff's calculations. Evidently, all he wants of him is to keep out of the way, and let him work. The whole burden of their education lies on his shoulders.'

'For my part,' said aunt Nesbit, 'I'm glad you've faith to believe in those children. I haven't. They'll be sure to turn out badly,—you see if they don't.'

'And I think,' said aunt Maria, 'we have enough to do with our own servants, without taking all these miserable whites on our hands too.'

'I'm not going to take all the whites,' said Nina. 'I'm going to take these children.'

'I wish you joy!' said aunt Maria.

'I wonder,' said aunt Nesbit, 'if Harry is under concern of mind. He seems to be dreadfully down this morning.'

'Is he?' said Nina. 'I hadn't noticed it.'

'Well,' said uncle John, 'perhaps he'll get set up to-day; who knows? In fact, I hope I shall myself. I tell you what it is, parson,' said he, laying his hand on Clayton's shoulder, 'you should take the gig to-day, and drive this little sinner, and let me go with the ladies. Of course you know Mrs. G. engrosses my whole soul; but, then, there's a kind of insensible improvement that comes from such celestial bodies as Miss Anne, here, that oughtn't to be denied to me. The clergy ought to enumerate female influence among the means of grace. I'm sure there's nothing builds me up like it.'

Clayton, of course, assented very readily to the arrangement, and the party was adjusted on this basis.

'Look ye here now, Clayton,' said uncle John, tipping him a sly wink after he had handed Nina in, 'you must confess that little penitent. She wants a spiritual director, my boy! I tell you what, Clayton, there isn't a girl like that in North Carolina. There's blood, sir, there. You must humour her on the bit, and give her her head a while. Ah! but she'll draw well at last! I always like a creature that kicks to pieces harness, wagon, and all, to begin with. They do the best when they are broken in.'

With which profound remarks uncle John turned to hand Anne Clayton to the carriage.

Clayton understood too well what he was about to make any such use of the interview as uncle John had suggested. He knew perfectly that his best chance, with a nature so restless as Nina's, was to keep up a sense of perfect freedom in all their intercourse, and, therefore, no grandfather could have been more collected and easy in a tête-à-tête drive than he. The last conversation at the camp-meeting he knew had brought them much nearer to each other than they had ever stood before, because both had spoken in deep earnestness of feeling of what lay deepest in their hearts, and one such moment, he well knew, was of more binding force than a hundred nominal betrothals.

The morning was one of those perfect ones which succeed a thunder-shower in the night; when the air, cleared of every gross vapour and impregnated with moist exhalations from the woods, is both balmy and stimulating. The steaming air developed to the full the balsamic properties of the pine-groves through which they rode; and, where the road skirted the swampy land, the light fell slanting on the leaves of the deciduous trees, rustling and dripping with the last night's shower. The heavens were full of those brilliant, island-like clouds, which are said to be a peculiarity of American skies, in their distinct relief above the intense blue. At a long distance they caught the sound of camp-meeting hymns. But, before they reached the ground, they saw, in more than one riotous group, the result of too frequent an application to Abijah Skinflint's department, and others of a similar character. They visited the quarters of Old Tiff, whom they found busy ironing some clothes for the baby, which he had washed and hung out the night before. The preaching had not yet commenced, and the party walked about among the tents. Women were busy cooking and washing dishes under the trees; and there was a great deal of good-natured gossiping. One of the most remarkable features of the day was a sermon from father Dickson, on the sins of the church. It concluded with a most forcible and solemn appeal to all on the subject of slavery. He reminded both the Methodists and Presbyterians that their books of discipline had most pointedly and unequivocally condemned it; that John Wesley had denounced it as the sum of all villainies, and that the general assemblies of the Presbyterian church had condemned it as wholly inconsistent with the religion of Christ, with the great law which requires us to love others as ourselves.

He related the scene which he had lately witnessed in the slave-coffle. He spoke of the horrors of the inter-state slave-trade, and drew a touching picture of the separation of families, and the rending of all domestic and social ties, which resulted from it; and, alluding to the unknown speaker of the evening before, told his audience that he had discerned a deep significance in his words, and that he feared, if there was not immediate repentance and reformation, the land would yet be given up to the visitation of Divine wrath. As he spoke with feeling, he awakened feeling in return. Many were affected even to tears; but, when the sermon was over, it seemed to melt away, as a wave flows back again into the sea. It was far easier to join in a temporary whirlwind of excitement than to take into consideration troublesome, difficult, and expensive reforms. Yet, still, it is due to the degenerate Christianity of the slave states to say, that during the long period in which the church there has been corrupting itself, and lowering its standard of right to meet a depraved institution, there have not been wanting, from time to time, noble confessors, who have spoken for God and humanity. For many years they were listened to with that kind of pensive tolerance which men give when they acknowledge their fault without any intention of mending. Of late years, however, the lines have been drawn more sharply, and such witnesses have spoken in peril of their lives; so that now seldom a voice arises except in approbation of oppression. The sermon was fruitful of much discussion in different parts of the camp-ground; and none, perhaps, was louder in the approbation of it than the Georgia trader, who, seated on Abijah Skinflint's counter, declared 'That was a parson as was a parson, and that he liked his pluck; and, for his part, when ministers and church members would give over buying, he should take up some other trade.'

'That was a very good sermon,' said Nina, 'and I believe every word of it. But, then, what do you suppose we ought to do?'

'Why,' said Clayton, 'we ought to contemplate emancipation as a future certainty, and prepare our people in the shortest possible time.'

This conversation took place as the party were seated at their nooning under the trees, around an unpacked hamper of cold provisions, which they were leisurely discussing.

'Why, bless my soul, Clayton,' said uncle John, 'I don't see the sense of such an anathema maranatha as we got to-day. Good Lord! what earthly harm are we doing? As to our niggers, they are better off than we are. I say it coolly—that is, as coolly as a man can say anything between one and two o'clock in such weather as this. Why, look at my niggers! Do I ever have any chickens, or eggs, or cucumbers? No, to be sure. All my chickens die, and the cut-worm plays the devil with my cucumbers; but the niggers have enough. Theirs flourish like a green bay tree; and of course, I have to buy of them. They raise chickens. I buy 'em, and cook 'em, and then they eat 'em! That's the way it goes. As to the slave-coffles, and slave-prisons, and the trade, why, that's abominable, to be sure. But, Lord bless you, I don't want it done! I'd kick a trader off my doorstep forthwith, though I'm all eaten up with woolly-heads, like locusts. I don't like such sermons, for my part.'

'Well,' said aunt Nesbit, 'our Mr. Titmarsh preached quite another way when I attended church in E——. He proved that slavery was a scriptural institution, and established by God.'

'I should think anybody's common sense would show that a thing which works so poorly for both sides couldn't be from God,' said Nina.

'Who is Mr. Titmarsh?' said Clayton to her, aside.

'Oh, one of aunt Nesbit's favourites, and one of my aversions. He isn't a man—he's nothing but a theological dictionary with a cravat on! I can't bear him!'

'Now, people may talk as much as they please of the educated democracy of the North,' said uncle John; 'I don't like 'em. What do working men want of education?—Ruins 'em! I've heard of their learned blacksmiths bothering around, neglecting their work, to make speeches. I don't like such things. It raises them above their sphere. And there's nothing going on up in those northern states but a constant confusion and hubbub. All sorts of heresies come from the North, and infidelity, and the Lord knows what! We have peace down here. To be sure, our poor whites are in a devil of a fix; but we haven't got 'em under yet. We shall get 'em in, one of these days, with our niggers, and then all will be contentment.'

'Yes,' said Nina, 'there's uncle John's view of the millennium!'

'To be sure,' said uncle John, 'the lower classes want governing—they want care; that's what they want. And all they need to know is, what the Episcopal Church Catechism says, "to learn and labour truly to get their own living in the state wherein it has pleased God to call them." That makes a well-behaved lower class, and a handsome, gentlemanly, orderly state of society. The upper classes ought to be instructed in their duties. They ought to be considerate and condescending and all that. That's my view of society.'

'Then you are no republican,' said Clayton.

'Bless you, yes, I am! I believe in the equality of gentlemen, and the equal rights of well-bred people. That's my idea of a republic.'

Clayton, Nina, and Anne, laughed.

'Now,' said Nina, 'to see uncle so jovial and free, and "Hail fellow, well met," with everybody, you'd think he was the greatest democrat that ever walked. But, you see, it's only because he's so immeasurable certain of his superior position—that's all. He isn't afraid to kneel at the altar with Bill Dakin, or Jim Sykes, because he's so sure that his position can't be compromised.'

'Besides that, chick,' said uncle John, 'I have the sense to know that, in my Maker's presence, all human differences are child's play.' And uncle John spoke with a momentary solemnity which was heartfelt.

It was agreed by the party that they would not stay to attend the evening exercises. The novelty of the effect was over, and aunt Nesbit spoke of the bad effects of falling dew and night air. Accordingly, as soon as the air was sufficiently cooled to make riding practicable, the party were again on their way home. The woodland path was streaked with green and golden bands of light thrown between the tree-trunks across the way, and the trees reverberated with the evening song of birds. Nina and Clayton naturally fell into a quiet and subdued train of conversation.

'It is strange,' said Nina, 'these talkings and searchings about religion. Now, there are people who have something they call religion, which I don't think does them any good. It isn't of any use, it doesn't make them better, and it makes them very disagreeable. I would rather be as I am, than to have what they call religion. But then there are others that have something which I know is religion; something that I know I have not; something that I'd give all the world to have, and don't know how to get. Now, ~~there~~ was Livy Ray, you ought to have seen Livy Ray, there was something so superior about her; and, what was extraordinary ~~is~~, that she was good without being stupid. What do you surmise the reason is that good people are generally so stupid?'

'A great deal,' said Clayton, 'is called goodness, which is nothing but want of force. A person is said to have self-government simply because he has nothing to govern. They talk about self-denial, when their desires are so weak that one course is about as easy to them as another. Such people easily fall into a religious routine, get by heart a set of phrases, and make, as you say, very stupid good people.'

'Now, Livy,' said Nina, 'was remarkable. She had that kind of education that they give girls in New England, stronger and more like a man's than ours. She could read Greek and Latin as easily as she could read French and Italian. She was keen, shrewd, and witty, and had a kind of wild grace about her, like these grape-vines; yet she was so strong! Well, do you know I almost worship Livy? And, I think, the little while she was in our school, she did me more good than all the teachers and studying put together. Why, it does one good to know that such people are possible. Don't you think it does?'

'Yes,' said Clayton. 'All the good in the world is done by the personality of people. Now, in books, it isn't so much what you learn from them, as the contact it gives you with the personality of the writer, that improves you. A real book always make you feel that there is more in the writer than anything that he has said.'

'That,' said Nina, eagerly, 'is just the way I feel toward Livy. She seems to me like a mine. When I was with her the longest, I always felt as if I hadn't half seen her. She always made me hungry to know her more. I mean to read you some of her letters, sometime. She writes beautiful letters; and I appreciate that very much, because I can't do it. I can talk better than I can write. Somehow my ideas will not take a course down through my arms; they always run up to my mouth. But you ought to see Livy; such people always make me very discontented with myself. I don't know what the reason is that I like to see superior people, and things, when they always make me realize what a poor concern I am. Now, the first time I heard Jenny Lind sing, it spoiled all my music and all my songs for me, turned them all to trash at one stroke, and yet I liked it. But I don't seem to have got any further in goodness than just dissatisfaction with myself.'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'there's where the foundation-stone of all excellence is laid. The very first blessing that Christ pronounced was on those who were poor in spirit. The indispensable condition to all progress in art, science, or religion, is to feel that we have nothing.'

'Do you know,' said Nina, after something of a pause, 'that I can't help wondering what you took up with me for. I have thought very often that you ought to have Livy Ray.'

'Well, I'm much obliged to you,' said Clayton, 'for your consideration in providing for me. But, supposing I should prefer my own choice after all? We men are a little wilful sometimes, like you of the gentler sex.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'if you will have the bad taste, then, to insist on liking me, let me warn you that you don't know what you are about. I'm a very unformed, unpractical person. I don't keep accounts. I'm nothing at all of a housekeeper. I shall leave open drawers, and scatter papers, and forget the day of the month, and tear the newspaper, and do everything else that is wicked; and then, one of these days it will be, "Nina, why haven't you done this?" and "Why haven't you done that?" and "Why don't you do the other?" and "Why do you do something else?" Ah! I've heard you men talk before. And then, you see, I shan't like it, and I shan't behave well. Haven't the least hope of it; won't ever engage to! So, now, won't you take warning?'

'No!' said Clayton, looking at her with a curious kind of smile; 'I don't think I shall.'

'How dreadfully positive and self-willed men are!' said Nina, drawing a long breath and pretending to laugh.

'There's so little of that in you ladies,' said Clayton, 'we have to do it for both.'

'So, then,' said Nina, looking round with a half-laugh and half-blush, 'you will persist?'

'Yes, you wicked little witch!' said Clayton, 'since you challenge me I will.' And, as he spoke, he passed his arm round Nina firmly, and fixed his eyes on hers. 'Come, now, my little Baltimore oriole, have I caught you? And—'

But we are making our chapter too long.

CHAPTER XXVI.

MILLY'S RETURN.

THE visit of Clayton and his sister, like all other pleasant things, had its end. Clayton was called back to his law-office and books, and Anne went to make some summer visits previous to her going to Clayton's plantation of Magnolia Grove, where she was to superintend his various schemes for the improvement of his negroes. Although it was gravely insisted to the last that there was no engagement between Nina and Clayton, it became evident enough to all parties that only the name was wanting. The warmest possible friendship existed between Nina and Anne; and notwithstanding that Nina almost every day said something which crossed Anne's nicely-adjusted views, and notwithstanding Anne had a gentle infusion of that disposition to sermonize which often exists in very excellent young ladies, still the two got on excellently well together. It is to be confessed that, the week after they left, Nina was rather restless and lonesome, and troubled to pass her time. An incident, which we shall relate, however, gave her something to think of, and opens a new page in our story.

While sitting on the veranda after breakfast, her attention was called by various exclamations from the negro department on the right side of the mansion; and, looking out, to her great surprise, she saw Milly standing amid a group who were surrounding her with eager demonstrations. Immediately she ran down the steps to inquire what it might mean. Approaching nearer, she was somewhat startled to see that her old friend had her head bound up and her arm in a sling, and as she came towards her she observed that she seemed to walk with difficulty, with a gait quite different from her usual firm, hilarious tread.

'Why, Milly!' she said, running towards her with eagerness, 'what is the matter?'

'Not much, chile, I reckon, now I's got home!' said Milly.

'Well, but what's the matter with your arm?'

'No great! Dat ar man shot me; but, praise de Lord, he didn't kill me. I don't owe him no grudge, but I thought it wan't right and fit that I should be treated so, and so I just put!'

'Why, come in the house this minute,' said Nina, laying hold of her friend and drawing her towards the steps. 'It's a shame! Come in, Milly, come in! That man! I knew he wasn't to be trusted. So this is the good place he found for you, is it?'

'Jes so,' said Tomtit, who, at the head of a dark stream of young juveniles, came after, with a towel hanging over one arm, and a knife half cleaned in his hand, while Rose and Old Hundred, and several others, followed to the veranda.

'Laws-a-me!' said aunt Rose; 'just to think on't! Dat's what 'tis for old families to hire der niggers out to common people!'

'Well,' said Old Hundred, 'Milly was allers too high feelin; held her head up too much. An't no ways surprised at it.'

'O, go 'long, you old hominy-beetle!' said aunt Rose. 'Don't know nobody dat holds up de head higher nor you does.'

Nina, after having dismissed the special train of the juveniles and servants, began to examine into the condition of her friend. The arm had evidently been grazed by a bullet, producing somewhat of a deep flesh-wound, which had been aggravated by the heat of the weather and the fatigue which she had undergone.

On removing the bandage around her head, a number of deep and severe flesh-cuts were perceived.

'What's all this?' said Nina.

'It's whar he hit me over de head. He was in drink, chile; he didn't well know what he was 'bout.'

'What an abominable shame!' said Nina. 'Look here,' turning round to aunt Nesbit; 'see what coppers of hiring Milly out.'

'I am sure I don't know what's to be done,' said aunt Nesbit, pitifully.

'Done! Why of course these are to be bandaged and put up in the first place,' said Nina, bustling about with great promptness, tearing off bandages and ringing for warm water. 'Aunt Milly, I'll do them up for you myself. I'm a pretty good nurse when I set about it.'

'Bless you, chile, but it seems good to get home 'mong friends!'

'Yes, and you won't go away again in a hurry,' said Nina, as she proceeded rapidly with her undertaking, washing and bandaging the wound. 'There, now,' she said, 'you look something like, and now you shall lie down in my room and take a little rest.'

'Thank ye, honey chile, but I'll go to my own room; 'pears like it's more home like,' said Milly. And Nina, with her usual energy, waited on her there, closed the blinds, and spread a shawl over her ~~after~~ she had laid down, and, after charging her two or three times to go to sleep and be quiet, she left her.

She could hardly wait to have her get through her nap, so full was she of the matter, and so interested to learn the particulars of her story.

'A pretty business, indeed!' she said to aunt Nesbit. 'We'll prosecute those people, and make them pay dear for it.'

'That will be a great expense,' said aunt Nesbit, apprehensively, 'besides the loss of time.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I shall write to Clayton about it directly. I know he'll feel just as I do. He understands the law, and all about those things, and he'll know how to manage it.'

'Everything will make expense,' said Aunt Nesbit, in a deplorable voice. 'I'm sure misfortunes never come single! Now, if she don't go back I shall lose her wages. And here's all the expenses of a lawsuit besides! I think she ought to have been more careful.'

'Why, aunt, for pity's sake, you don't pretend that you wish Milly to go back?'

'O, no, of course I don't; but, then, it's a pity. It will be a great loss every way.'

'Why, aunt, you really talk as if you didn't think of anything but your loss. You don't seem to think anything about what Milly has had to suffer.'

'Why, of course, I feel sorry for that,' said aunt Nesbit; 'I wonder if she is going to be laid up long. I wish, on the whole, I had hired out one that wasn't quite so useful to me.'

'Now, if that isn't just like her,' said Nina, in an indignant tone, as she flung out of the room and went to look softly in at Milly's door. 'Never can see, hear, or think of anything but herself, no matter what happens. I wonder why Milly couldn't have belonged to me.'

After two or three hours' sleep Milly came out of her room, seeming much better. A perfectly-vigorous physical system and vital powers, all moving in the finest order, enabled her to endure much more than ordinary, and Nina soon became satisfied that no material injury had been sustained, and that in a few days she would be quite recovered.

'And now, Milly, do pray tell me where you have been,' said Nina, 'and what this is all about?'

'Why, you see, honey, I was hired to Mr. Barker, and dey said he was a mighty nice man; and so he was, honey, most times: but, den, you see, honey, dere's some folks dere's two men in 'em—one is a good one, and t'oder is very bad. Well, dis yer was just dat sort. You see, honey, I wouldn't go for to say dat he got drunk, but he was dat sort dat if he took ever so little it made him kind o' ugly and cross, and so dere wan't no suiting him. Well, his wife, she was pretty far, and so he was too, 'cept in spots. He was one of dese yer streaked men, dat has dresful ugly streaks; and, some of dem times, de Lord only knows what he won't do! Well, you see, honey, I thought I was getting along right well at first, and I was mighty pleased; but dere was one day he came home and 'peared like dere couldn't nobody suit him. Well, you see dey had a gal dere, and she had a chile, and dis yer chile was a little thing. It got playing with a little burnt stick, and it blacked one of his clean shirts I had just hung up, for I'd been ironing you see. Just den he came along, and you never heerd a man go on so! I's heerd bad talk afore, but I never heerd sich! He swore he'd kill de chile, and I thought my soul he would. De por little thing run behind me, and I just keep him off on it, 'cause I knowed he wan't fit to touch it; and den he turned on me, and he got a cow-hide and he beat me over de head. I thought my soul he'd kill me, but I got to de door and shut de chile out, and Hannah she took it and ran with it. But, bless you, it 'peared like he was a tiger, screeching and foaming, and beating me! I broke way from him and run. He just caught de rifle, he always keep one loaded and shot at me, and de ball just struck my arm and glanced off again. Bless de Lord it didn't break it. Dat ar was a mighty close run, I can tell you! But I did run, 'cause, thinks I, dere an't no safety for me in dat ar house: and, you see, I run till I got to de bush, and den I got to whar dere was some free coloured folks, and dey did it up and kept me a day or two. Den I started and came home, just as you told me to.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'you did well to come home. And I tell you what, I'm going to have that man prosecuted.'

'O laws no, Miss Nina! don't you go to doing nothing to him. His wife is a mighty nice woman, and 'peared like he didn't rightly know what he was 'bout.'

'Yes; but Milly, you ought to be willing, because it may make him more careful with other people.'

'Laws, Miss Nina, why dere is some sense in dat; but I wouldn't do it as bearing malice.'

'Not at all,' said Nina. 'I shall write to Mr. Clayton, and take his advice 'bout it.'

'He's a good man,' said Milly. 'He won't say nothing dat an't right. I'spect dat will do very well, dat ar way.'

'Yes,' said Nina, 'such people must be taught that the law will take hold of them. That will bring them to their bearings!'

Nina went immediately to her room, and despatched a long letter to Clayton, full of all the particulars, and begging his immediate assistance. Our readers,—those who have been in similar circumstances,—will not wonder that Clayton saw in this letter an immediate call of duty to go to Canema. In fact, as soon as the letter could go to him, and he could perform a rapid horse-back journey, he was once more a member of the domestic circle. He entered upon the case with great confidence and enthusiasm.

‘It is a debt which we owe,’ he said, ‘to the character of our state, and to the purity of our institutions, to prove the efficiency of the law in behalf of that class of our population whose helplessness places them more particularly under our protection. They are to us in the condition of children under age, and any violation of their rights should be more particularly attended to.’

He went immediately to the neighbouring town, where Milly had been employed, and found, fortunately, that the principal facts had been subject to the inspection of white witnesses. A woman who had been hired to do some sewing, had been in the next room during the whole time; and Milly’s flight from the house, and the man’s firing after her, had been observed by some workmen in the neighbourhood. Everything, therefore, promised well, and the suit was entered forthwith.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE TRIAL.

‘WELL, now,’ said Frank Russel to one or two lawyers with whom he was sitting in a side room of the court-house at E——, ‘look out for breakers! Clayton has mounted his war-horse, and is coming upon us, now, like leviathan from the rushes.’

‘Clayton is a good fellow,’ said one of them. ‘I like him, though he doesn’t talk much.’

‘Good!’ said Russel, taking his cigar from his mouth. ‘Why, as the backwoodsmen say, he an’t nothing else! He is a great seventy-four pounder charged to the muzzle with goodness! But if he should be once fired off, I’m afraid he’ll carry everything out of the world with him. Because, you see, abstract goodness doesn’t suit our present mortal condition. But it is a perfect godsend that he has such a case as this to manage for his maiden plea, because it just falls in with his herioc turn. Why, when I heard of it, I assure you I bestirred myself. I went about, and got Smithers, and Jones, and Peters to put off suits, so as to give him fair field and full play. For if he succeeds in this, it may give him so good a conceit of the law that he will keep on with it.'

'Why,' said the other, 'don't he like the law? What's the matter with the law?'

'O, nothing. Only Clayton has got one of those ethereal stomachs that rises against almost everything in this world. Now, there isn't more than one case in a dozen that he'll undertake. He sticks and catches just like an old bureau-drawer. Some conscientious crick in his back is always taking him at a critical moment, and so he is knocked up for actual work. But this defending a slave-woman will suit him to a T.'

'She is a nice creature, isn't she?' said one of them.

'And belongs to a good old family,' said another.

'Yes,' said the third, 'and I understand his lady-love has something to do with the case.'

'Yes,' said Russel, 'to be sure she has. The woman belongs to a family connection of hers, I'm told. Mr Gordon is a spicy little puss—one that would be apt to resent anything of that sort; and the Gordons are a very influential family. He is sure to get the case, though I'm not clear that the law is on his side by any means.'

'Not?' said the other barrister, who went by the name of Will Jones.

'No,' said Russel. 'In fact, I'm pretty clear it isn't. But that will make no odds. When Clayton is thoroughly waked up he is a whole team, I can tell you. He'll take jury and judge along with him, fast enough.'

'I wonder,' said one, 'that Barker didn't compound the matter.'

'O, Barker is one of the stubbed sort. You know these middling kind of people always have a spite against old families. He makes fight because it is the Gordons, that's all. And there comes in his republicanism. He isn't going to be whipped in by the Gordons. Barker has got Scotch blood in him, and he'll hang on to the case like death.'

'Clayton will make a good speech,' said Jones.

'Speech? that he will!' said Russel. 'Bless me, I could bring off a good speech on it myself! Because, you see, it really was quite an outrage, and the woman is a presentable creature. And, then, there's the humane dodge; that can be taken, beside all the chivalry part of defending the helpless, and all that sort of thing. I wouldn't ask for a better thing to work up into a speech. But Clayton will do it better yet, because he is actually sincere in it. And, after all's said and done, there's a good deal in that. When a fellow speaks in solemn earnest he gives a kind of weight that you can't easily get at any other way.'

'Well, but,' said one, 'I don't understand you, Russel, why you think the law isn't on Clayton's side. I'm sure it's a very clear case of terrible abuse.'

'O, certainly it is,' said Russel; 'and the man is a dolt and a brute beast, and ought to be shot, and so forth; but then, he hasn't really exceeded his legal limits, because, you see, the law gives to the hirer all the rights of the master. There's no getting away from that, in my opinion. Now any master might have done all that, and nobody could have done anything about it. They do do it, for that matter, if they're bad enough, and nobody thinks of touching them.'

'Well, I say,' said Jones, 'Russel, don't you think that's too bad?'

'Laws, yes, man, but the world is full of things that are too bad. It's a bad kind of a place,' said Russel, as he lit another cigar.

'Well, how do you think Clayton is going to succeed,' said Jones, 'if the law is so clearly against him?'

'O, bless you, you don't know Clayton. He's a glorious mystifier. In the first place, he mystifies himself. And now, you mark me: when a powerful fellow mystifies himself, so that he really gets himself thoroughly on to his own side, there's nobody he can't mystify. I speak it in sober sadness, Jones, that the want of this faculty is a great hindrance to me in a certain class of cases. You see, I can put on the pathetic and heroic, after a sort; but I don't take myself along with me—I don't really believe myself. There's the trouble. It's this power of self-mystification that makes what you call earnest men. If men saw the real bread and butter and green cheese of life, as I see it—the hard, dry, primitive facts—they couldn't raise such commotions as they do.'

'Russel, it always makes me uncomfortable to hear you talk. It seems as if you didn't believe in anything.'

'O yes, I do,' said Russel; 'I believe in the multiplication-table, and several other things of that nature at the beginning of the arithmetic, and also that the wicked will do wickedly. But as to Clayton's splendid abstractions I only wish him joy of them. But then, I shall believe him while I hear him talk; so will you; so will all the rest of us. That's the fun of it. But the thing will be just where it was before, and I shall find it so when I wake to-morrow morning. It's a pity such fellows as Clayton couldn't be used as we use big guns. He is death on anything he fires at; and if he only would let me load and point him, he and I together would make a firm that would sweep the land. But here he comes, upon my word!

'Hallo, Clayton! all ready?'

'Yes,' said Clayton; 'I believe so. When will the case be called?'

'To-day, I'm pretty sure,' said Russel.

Clayton was destined to have something of an audience in his first plea, for the Gordons being an influential and a largely-connected family, there was quite an interest excited among them in the affair. Clayton, also, had many warm personal friends, and his father, mother, and sister were to be present, for, though residing in a different part of the state, they were at this time on a visit in the vicinity of the town of E——.

There is something in the first essay of a young man, in any profession, like the first launching of a ship, which has a never-ceasing hold on human sympathies. Clayton's father, mother, and sister, with Nina, at the time of the dialogue we have given, were sitting together in the parlour of a friend's house in E——, discussing the same event.

'I am sure that he will get the case,' said Anne Clayton, with the confidence of a generous woman, and warm-hearted sister. 'He has been showing me the course of his argument, and it is perfectly irresistible. Has he said anything to you about it, father?'

Judge Clayton had been walking up and down the room, with his hands behind him, with his usual air of considerate gravity. Stopping short at Anne's question, he said,—'Edward's mind and mine work so differently, that I have thought best not to embarrass him by any conference on the subject. I consider the case an unfortunate one, and would rather he could have had some other.'

'Why,' said Anne eagerly, 'don't you think he'll gain it?'

'Not if the case goes according to law,' said Judge Clayton. 'But then, Edward has a great deal of power of eloquence, and a good deal of skill in making a diversion from the main point, so that perhaps he may get the case.'

'Why,' said Anne, 'I thought cases were always decided according to law! What else do they make laws for?'

'You are very innocent, my child,' said Judge Clayton.

‘But, father, the proof of the outrage is most abundant. Nobody could pretend to justify it.’

‘Nobody will, child. But that’s nothing to the case. The simple point is, did the man exceed his legal power? It’s my impression he did not.’

‘Father, what a horrible doctrine!’ said Anne.

‘I simply speak of what is,’ said Judge Clayton. ‘I don’t pretend to justify it. But Edward has great power of exciting the feelings, and under the influence of his eloquence the case may go the other way, and humanity triumph at the expense of law.’

Clayton’s plea came on in the afternoon, and justified the expectations of his friends. His personal presence was good, his voice melodious, and his elocution fine. But what impressed his auditors, perhaps, more than these, was a certain elevation and clearness in the moral atmosphere around him—a gravity and earnestness of conviction, which gave a secret power to all he said. He took up the doctrine of the dependent relations of life, and of those rules by which they should be guided and restrained, and showed that while absolute power seems to be a necessary condition of many relations of life, both reason and common sense dictate certain limits to it. The law guarantees to the parent, the guardian, and the master, the right of enforcing obedience by chastisement; and the reason for it is, that the subject being supposed to be imperfectly developed, his good will, on the whole, be better consulted by allowing to his lawful guardian this power. ‘The good of the subject,’ he said, ‘is understood to be the foundation of the right; but when chastisement is inflicted without just cause, and in a manner so inconsiderate and brutal as to endanger the safety and well-being of the subject, the great foundation principle of the law is violated. The act becomes perfectly lawless, and as incapable of legal defence as it is abhorrent to every sentiment of humanity and justice. He should endeavour to show,’ he said, ‘by full testimony, that the case in question was one of this sort.’

In examining witnesses Clayton showed great dignity and acuteness, and as the feeling of the court was already prepossessed in his favour, the cause evidently gathered strength as it went on. The testimony showed, in the most conclusive manner, the general excellence of Milly’s character, and the utter brutality of the outrage which had been committed upon her.

In his concluding remarks, Clayton addressed the jury in a tone of great elevation and solemnity on the duty of those to whom is intrusted the guardianship of the helpless. 'No obligation,' he said, 'can be stronger to an honourable mind than the obligation of entire dependence. The fact that a human being has no refuge from our powers, no appeal from our decisions, so far from leading to careless security, is one of the strongest possible motives to caution, and to most exact care. The African race,' he said, 'had been bitter sufferers. Their history had been one of wrong and cruelty, painful to every honourable mind. We of the present day, who sustain the relation of slaveholder,' he said, 'receive from the hands of our fathers an awful trust. Irresponsible power is the greatest trial of humanity. And if we do not strictly guard our own moral purity in the use of it, we shall degenerate into despots and tyrants. No consideration can justify us in holding this people in slavery an hour, unless we make this slavery a guardian relation, in which our superior strength and intelligence is made the protector and educator of their simplicity and weakness. The eyes of the world are fastened upon us,' he said. 'Our continuing in this position at all is, in many quarters, matter of severe animadversion. Let us therefore show, by the spirit in which we administer our laws, by the impartiality with which we protect their rights, that the master of the helpless African is his best and truest friend.'

It was evident, as Clayton spoke, that he carried the whole of his audience with him. The counsel on the other side felt himself much straitened. There is very little possibility of eloquence in defending a manifest act of tyranny and cruelty. And a man speaks also at great disadvantage, who not only is faint-hearted in his own cause, but feels the force of the whole surrounding atmosphere against him. In fact, the result was, that the judge charged the jury, if they found the chastisement to have been disproportionate and cruel, to give verdict for the plaintiff. The jury, with little discussion, gave it unanimously accordingly; and so Clayton's first cause was won.

If ever a woman feels proud of her lover, it is when she sees him a successful public speaker; and Nina, when the case was over, stood half-laughing, half-blushing, in a circle of ladies, who alternately congratulated and rallied her on Clayton's triumph.

'Ah!' said Frank Russel, 'we understand the magic! The knight always fights well when his lady-love looks down! Miss Gordon must have the credit of this. She took all the strength out of the other side—like the mountain of loadstone, that used to draw all the nails out of the ship.'

'I am glad,' said Judge Clayton, as he walked home with his wife—'I am very glad that Edward has met with such success. His nature is so fastidious that I have had my fears that he would not adhere to the law. There are many things in it, I grant, which would naturally offend a fastidious mind, and one which, like his, is always idealizing life.'

'He has established a noble principle,' said Mrs. Clayton.

'I wish he had,' said the judge. 'It would be a very ungrateful task, but I could have shattered his argument all to pieces.'

'Don't tell him so?' said Mrs. Clayton, apprehensively. 'Let him have the comfort of it.'

'Certainly I shall. Edward is a good fellow, and I hope, after a while, he'll draw well in the harness.'

Meanwhile, Frank Russel and Will Jones were walking along in another direction.

'Didn't I tell you so?' said Russel. 'You see, Clayton run down Bedford horse and foot, and made us all as solemn as a preparatory lecture.'

'But he had a good argument,' said Jones.

'To be sure he had. I never knew him to want that. He builds up splendid arguments, always, and the only thing to be said of him, after it's all over, is, it isn't so; it's no such thing. Barker is terribly wroth, I can assure you. He swears he'll appeal the case. But that's no matter. Clayton has had his day all the same. He is evidently waked up. O, he has no more objection to a little popularity than you and I have, now; and if we could humour him along, as we would a trout, we should have him a first-rate lawyer one of these days. Did you see Miss Gordon while he was pleading? By George! she looked so handsome, I was sorry I hadn't taken her myself.'

'Is she that dashing, little flirting Miss Gordon that I heard of in New York?'

'The very same.'

'How came she to take a fancy to him?'

'She? How do I know? She's as full of streaks as a tulip, and her liking for him is one of them. Did you notice her, Will?—scarf flying one way, and little curls, and pennants, and streamers, and veil the other. And then, those eyes! She's alive, every inch of her! She puts me in mind of a sweetbrier bush, winking and blinking, full of dew-drops, full of roses, and brisk little thorns besides. Ah! she'll keep him awake!'

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MAGNOLIA GROVE.

JUDGE CLAYTON was not mistaken in supposing that his son would contemplate with satisfaction the issue of the case he had defended. As we have already intimated, Clayton was somewhat averse to the practice of the law. Regard for the feelings of his father had led him to resolve that he would at least give it a fair trial. His own turn of mind would have led him to some work of more immediate and practical philanthropy. He would much have preferred to retire to his own estate, and devote himself with his sister to the education of his servants. But he felt that he could not, with due regard to his father's feelings, do this until he had given professional life a fair trial. After the scene of the trial which we have described, he returned to his business, and Anne solicited Nina to accompany her for a few weeks to their plantation at Magnolia Grove, whither, as in duty bound, we may follow her. Our readers therefore will be pleased to find themselves transported to the shady side of a veranda belonging to Clayton's establishment at Magnolia Grove. The place derived its name from a group of these beautiful trees, in the centre of which the house was situated. It was a long, low cottage, surrounded by deep verandas, festooned with an exuberance of those climbing plants which are so splendid in the southern latitude. The range of apartments which opened on the veranda where Anne and Nina were sitting were darkened to exclude flies; but the doors, standing open, gave picture-like gleams of the interior. The white, matted floors, light bamboo furniture, couches covered with glazed white linen, and the large vases of roses disposed here and there where the light would fall upon them, presented a back-ground of inviting coolness. It was early in the morning, and the two ladies were enjoying the luxury of a tête-à-tête breakfast, before the sun had yet dried the heavy dews which gave such freshness to the morning air. A small table which stood between them was spread with choice fruits, arranged on dishes in green leaves; a pitcher of iced milk, and a delicate little tête-à-tête coffee-service, dispensing the perfume of the most fragrant coffee. Nor were there wanting those small delicate biscuits, and some of those curious forms of corn-bread, of the manufacture of which every southern cook is so justly proud. Nor should we omit the central vase of monthly roses, of every shade of colour, the daily arrangement of which was the special delight of Anne's little brown waiting-maid, Lettice. Anne Clayton, in a fresh white morning-wrapper, with her pure healthy complexion, fine teeth, and frank beaming smile, looked like a queenly damask rose. A queen she really was on her own plantation, reigning by the strongest of all powers, that of love. The African race have large ideality and veneration; and in no drawing-room could Anne's beauty and grace, her fine manners and carriage, secure a more appreciating and unlimited admiration and devotion. The negro race, with many of the faults of children, unite many of their most amiable qualities in the simplicity and confidingness with which they yield themselves up in admiration of a superior friend. Nina had been there but a day, yet could not fail to read in the eyes of all, how absolute was the reign which Anne held over their affections.

'How delightful the smell of this magnolia blossom!' said Nina. 'Oh, I'm glad that you waked me so early, Anne.'

'Yes,' said Anne, 'in this climate early rising becomes a necessary of life to those who mean to have any real, positive pleasure in it; and I'm one of the sort that must have positive pleasures. Merely negative rest, lassitude, and dreaming, are not enough for me; I want to feel that I'm alive, and that I accomplish something.'

'Yes, I see,' said Nina. 'You are not nominally, like me, but really housekeeper. What wonderful skill you seem to have! Is it possible that you keep nothing locked up here?'

'No,' said Anne, 'nothing. I am released from the power of the keys, thank fortune! When I first came here, everybody told me it was sheer madness to try such a thing. But I told them that I was determined to do it, and Edward upheld me in it; and you can see how well I've succeeded.'

'Indeed,' said Nina, 'you must have magic power, for I never saw a household move on so harmoniously. All your servants seem to think, and contrive, and take an interest in what they are doing. How did you begin? What did you do?'

'Well,' said Anne, 'I'll tell you the history of the plantation. In the first place, it belonged to mamma's uncle; and, not to spoil a story for relation's sake, I must say he was a dissipated, unprincipled man. He lived a perfectly heathen life here, in the most shocking way you can imagine; and so the poor creatures who were under him were worse heathens than he. He lived with a quadroon woman, who was violent-tempered, and, when angry, ferociously cruel; and so the servants were constantly passing from the extreme of indulgence to the extreme of cruelty. You can scarce have an idea of the state we found them in. My heart almost failed me; but Edward said, "Don't give it up, Anne; try the good that is in them." Well, I confess it seemed very much as it seemed to me when I was once at a water-cure establishment. Patients would be brought in languid, pale, cold, half-dead; and it appeared as if it would kill them to apply cold water. But somehow or other there was a vital power in them that reacted under it. Well, just so it was with my servants. I called them all together, and I said to them, "Now, people have always said that you are the greatest thieves in the world; that there is no managing you except by locking up everything from you. But I think differently. I have an idea that you can be trusted. I have been telling people that they don't know how much good there is in you; and just to show them what you can do, I'm going to begin and leave the closets, and doors, and everything unlocked, and I shall not watch you. You can take my things, if you choose; and if, after a time, I find that you can't be trusted, I shall go back to the old way." Well, my dear, I wouldn't have believed myself that the thing would have answered so well. In the first place, approbateness is a stronger principle with the African race than almost any other; they like to be thought well of. Immediately there was the greatest spirit in the house; for the poor creatures, having suddenly made the discovery that somebody thought they were to be trusted, were very anxious to keep up the reputation. The elder ones watched the younger; and in fact, my dear, I had very little trouble. The children at first troubled me, going into my store-closet and getting the cake, notwithstanding very spirited government on the part of the mummies. So I called my family in session again, and said that their conduct had confirmed my good opinion; that I always knew they could be trusted, and that my friends were astonished to hear how well they did; but that I had observed that some of the children probably had taken my cake. "Now, you know," said I, "that I have no objection to your having some. If any of you would enjoy a piece of cake, I shall be happy to give it you; but it is not agreeable to have things in my closet fingered over. I shall therefore set a plate of cake out every day, and anybody that wishes to take some I hope will take that." Well, my dear, my plate of cake stood there and dried. You won't believe me, but in fact it was not touched.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I shouldn't think you could have had our Tomtit here. Why really this goes beyond the virtue of white children.'

'My dear, it isn't such a luxury to white children to be thought well of, and have a character. You must take that into account. It was a taste of a new kind of pleasure, made attractive by its novelty.'

'Yes,' said Nina; 'I have something in me which makes me feel this would be the right way. I know it would be with me. There's nothing like confidence. If a person trusts me I am bound.'

'Yet,' said Anne, 'I can't get the ladies of my acquaintance to believe in it. They see how I get along, but they insist upon it that it is some secret magic or art of mine.'

'Well, it is so,' said Nina. 'Such things are just like the divining-rod; they won't work in every hand: it takes a real, generous, warm-hearted woman, like you, Anne. But, could you carry your system through your plantation as well as your house?'

'The field-hands were more difficult to manage on some accounts,' said Anne, 'but the same principle prevailed with them. Edward tried all he could to awaken self-respect. Now, I counselled that we should endeavour to form some decent habits before we built the cabins over. I told him they could not appreciate neatness and order. "Very likely they cannot," he said, "but we are not to suppose it;" and he gave orders immediately for that pretty row of cottages you saw down at the quarters. He put up a large bathing-establishment; yet he did not enforce personal cleanliness at first by strict rules. Those who began to improve first were encouraged and noticed; and as they found this a passport to favour, the thing took rapidly. It required a great while to teach them how to be consistently orderly and cleanly, even after the first desire had been awakened, because it isn't every one that likes neatness and order who has the forethought and skill to secure it. But there has been a steady progress in these respects. One curious peculiarity of Edward's management gives rise to a good many droll scenes. He has instituted a sort of jury trial among them. There are certain rules for the order and well-being of the plantation, which all agree to abide by; and in all offences the man is tried by a jury of his peers. Mr. Smith, our agent, says, that these scenes are sometimes very diverting, but on the whole there's a good deal of shrewdness and sense manifested; but, he says, that in general they incline much more to severity than he would. You see the poor creatures have been so barbarized by the way they have been treated in past times, that it has made them hard and harsh. I assure you, Nina, I never appreciated the wisdom of God in the laws which he made for the Jews in the wilderness, as I have since I've tried the experiment myself of bringing a set of slaves out of barbarism. Now, this that I am telling you is the fairest side of the story. I can't begin to tell you the thousand difficulties and trials which we have encountered in it. Sometimes I've been almost worn out and discouraged. But, then, I think if there is a missionary work in this world it is this.'

'And what do your neighbours think about it?' said Nina.

'Well,' said Anne, 'they are all very polite, well-bred people, the families with whom we associate; and such people, of course, would never think of interfering or expressing difference of opinion in any very open way; but I have the impression that they regard it with suspicion. They sometimes let fall words which make me think they do. It's a way of proceeding which very few would adopt, because it is not a money-making operation by any means. The plantation barely pays for itself, because Edward makes that quite a secondary consideration. The thing which excites the most murmuring is our teaching them to read. I teach the children myself two hours every day, because I think this would be less likely to be an offence than if I should hire a teacher. Mr. Smith teaches any of the grown men who are willing to take the trouble to learn. Any man who performs a certain amount of labour can secure to himself two or three hours a-day to spend as he chooses; and many do choose to learn. Some of the men and the women have become quite good readers, and Clayton is constantly sending books for them.' This, I'm afraid, gives great offence. It is against the law to do it; but as unjust laws are sometimes lived down, we thought we would test the practicability of doing this. There was some complaint made of our servants, because they have not the servile subdued air which commonly marks the slave, but look, speak, and act as if they respected themselves. I'm sometimes afraid that we shall have trouble; but then I hope for the best.'

'What does Mr. Clayton expect to be the end of all this?' said • Nina.

‘Why, I think Edward has an idea that one of these days they may be emancipated on the soil, just as the serfs were in England. It looks to me rather hopeless, I must say; but he says the best way is for some one to begin and set an example of what ought to be done, and he hopes that in time it will be generally followed. It would if all men were like him; but there lies my doubt. The number of those who would pursue such a disinterested course is very small. But who comes there? Upon my word if there isn’t my particular admirer, Mr. Bradshaw!’

As Anne said this, a very gentlemanly middle-aged man came up on horseback, on the carriage-drive which passed in front of the veranda. He bore in his hand a large bunch of different-coloured roses; and, alighting and delivering his horse to his servant, came up the steps and presented it to Anne.

‘There,’ said he, ‘are the first-fruits of my roses, in the garden that I started in Rosedale.’

‘Beautiful!’ said Anne, taking them. ‘Allow me to present you to Miss Gordon.’

‘Miss Gordon, your most obedient,’ said Mr. Bradshaw, bowing obsequiously.

‘You are just in season, Mr. Bradshaw,’ said Anne, ‘for I’m sure you couldn’t have had your breakfast before you started; so sit down and help us with ours.’

‘Thank you, Miss Anne,’ said Mr. Bradshaw, ‘the offer is too tempting to be refused.’ And he soon established himself as a third at the little table, and made himself very sociable.

‘Well, Miss Anne, how do your plans proceed—all your benevolences and cares? I hope your angel ministrations don’t exhaust you?’

‘Not at all, Mr. Bradshaw; do I look like it?’

‘No, indeed; but such energy is perfectly astonishing to us all.’

Nina’s practised eye observed that Mr. Bradshaw had that particular nervous, restless air which belongs to a man who is charged with a particular message, and finds himself unexpectedly blockaded by the presence of a third person. So, after breakfast, exclaiming that she had left her crochet-needle in her apartment, and resisting Anne’s offer to send a servant for it, by declaring that nobody could find it but herself, she left the veranda.

Mr. Bradshaw had been an old family friend for many years, and stood with Anne almost on the easy footing of a relation, which gave him the liberty of speaking with freedom. The moment the door of the parlor closed after Nina he drew a chair near to Anne, and sat with the unmistakable air of a man who is going into a confidential communication.

'The fact is, my dear Miss Clayton,' he said, 'I have something on my mind that I want to tell you, and I hope you will think my long friendship for the family a sufficient warrant for my speaking on matters which really belong chiefly to yourself. The fact is, my dear Miss Clayton, I was at a small dinner-party of gentlemen the other day, at Colonel Grandon's. There was a little select set there, you know; the Howards, the Elliots, and the Howlands, and so on; and the conversation happened to turn upon your brother. Now, there was the very greatest respect for him; they seemed to have the highest possible respect for his motives; but still they felt that he was going on a very dangerous course.'

'Dangerous?' said Anne, a little startled.

'Yes, really dangerous; and I think so myself, though I, perhaps, don't feel as strongly as some do.'

'Really,' said Anne, 'I'm quite at a loss!'

'My dear Miss Anne, it's these improvements, you know, which you are making. Don't misapprehend me! Admirable, very admirable, in themselves; done from the most charming of motives, Miss Anne, but dangerous, dangerous!'

The solemn, mysterious manner in which these last words were pronounced, made Anne laugh; but when she saw the expression of real concern on the face of her good friend, she checked herself, and said, 'Pray, explain yourself. I don't understand you.'

'Why, Miss Anne, it's just here. We appreciate your humanity, and your self-denial, and your indulgence to your servants. Everybody is of opinion that it's admirable. You are really quite a model for us all. But, when it comes to teaching them to read and write, Miss Anne,' he said, lowering his voice, 'I think you don't consider what a dangerous weapon you are putting into their hands. The knowledge will spread on to the other plantations; bright niggers will pick it up; for the very fellows who are most dangerous are the very ones who will be sure to learn.'

'What if they should?' said Anne.

'Why, my dear Miss Anne,' said he, lowering his voice, 'the facilities that it will afford them for combinations, for insurrections! You see, Miss Anne, I read a story once of a man who made a cork leg with such wonderful accuracy, that it would walk of itself, and when he got it on, he couldn't stop its walking—it walked him to death—actually did! Walked him up hill, and down dale, till the poor man fell exhausted; and then it ran off with his body. And it's running with his skeleton to this day I believe.'

And good-natured Mr. Bradshaw conceived such a ridiculous idea, at this stage of his narrative, that he leaned back in his chair and laughed heartily, wiping his perspiring face with a cambric pocket-handkerchief.

'Really, Mr. Bradshaw, it's a very amusing idea, but I don't see the analogy,' said Anne.

'Why, don't you see? You begin teaching niggers, and having reading and writing, and all these things, going on, and they begin to open their eyes, and look round and think; and they are having opinions of their own, they won't take yours; and they want to rise directly. And if they can't rise, why, they are all discontented; and there's the what's-his-name to pay with them! Then come conspiracies and insurrections, no matter how well you treat them; and, now, we South Carolinans have had experience in this matter. You must excuse us, but it is a terrible subject with us. Why, the leaders of that conspiracy, all of them, were fellows who could read and write, and who had nothing in the world to wish for, in the way of comfort, treated with every consideration by their masters. It is a most melancholy chapter in human nature. It shows that there is no trust to be placed in them. And, now, the best way to get along with negroes, in my opinion, is to make them happy; give them plenty to eat and drink and wear, and keep them amused and excited, and don't work them too hard. I think it's a great deal better than this kind of exciting instruction. Mind,' he said, seeing that Anne was going to interrupt him—'Mind, now, I'd have religious instruction, of course. Now, this system of oral instruction, teaching them hymns and passages of scripture suited to their peculiar condition, it's just the thing; it isn't so liable to these dangers. I hope you'll excuse me, Miss Anne, but the gentlemen really feel very serious about these things; they find it's affecting their own negroes. You know, somehow, everything goes round from one plantation to another; and one of them said that he had a very smart man, who is married to one of your women, and he actually found him with a spelling-book, sitting out under a tree. He said if the man had had a rifle he couldn't have been more alarmed; because the man was just one of those sharp, resolute fellows, that, if he knew how to read and write, there's no knowing what he would do. Well, now, you see how it is. He takes the spelling-book away, and he tells him he will give him nine and thirty if he ever finds him with it again. What's the consequence? Why, the consequence is, the man sulks and gets ugly, and he has to sell him. That's the way it's operating.'

'Well, then,' said Anne, looking somewhat puzzled, 'I will strictly forbid our people to allow spelling-books to go out of their hands, or to communicate any of these things off of the plantation.'

'O I tell you Miss Anne you can't do it. You don't know the passion in human nature for anything that is forbidden. Now, I believe it's more that than love of reading. You can't shut up such an experiment as you are making here. It's just like a fire. It will blaze; it will catch on all the plantations round; and I assure you it's matter of life and death with us. You smile, Miss Anne, but it is so.'

'Really, my dear Mr. Bradshaw, you could not have addressed me on a more unpleasant subject. I am sorry to excite the apprehension of our neighbours; but—'

'Give me leave to remind you, also, Miss Anne, that the teaching of slaves to read and write is an offence to which a severe penalty is attached by the laws.'

'I thought,' said Anne, 'that such barbarous laws were a dead letter in a Christian community, and that the best tribute I could pay to its Christianity was practically to disregard them.'

'By no means, Miss Anne, by no means! Why, look at us here in South Carolina. The negroes are three to one over the whites now. Will it do to give them the further advantage of education, and facilities of communication? You see, at once, it will not. Now, well-bred people, of course, are extremely averse to mingling in the affairs of other families; and had you merely taught a few favourites, in a private way, as I believe people now and then do, it wouldn't have seemed so bad; but to have regular provision for teaching school, and school-houses. I think, Miss Anne, you'll find it will result in unpleasant consequences.'

'Yes, I fancy,' said Anne, raising herself up, and slightly colouring, 'that I see myself in the penitentiary for the sin and crime of teaching children to read! I think, Mr. Bradshaw, it is time such laws were disregarded. Is not that the only way in which many laws are repealed? society outgrows them, people disregard them, and so they fall away, like the calyx from some of my flowers. Come now, Mr. Bradshaw, come with me to my school. I'm going to call it together,' said Anne, rising, and beginning to go down the veranda steps. 'Certainly, my dear friend, you ought not to judge without seeing. Wait a moment till I call Miss Gordon.' And Anne stepped across the shady parlour, and in a few moments reappeared with Nina, both arrayed in white cape bonnets. They crossed to the right of the house, to a small cluster of neat cottages, each one of which had its little vegetable garden, and its plot in front carefully tended with flowers. They passed onward into a grove of magnolias which skirted the back of the house, till they came to a little building, with the external appearance of a small Grecian temple, the pillars of which were festooned with jessamine.

'Pray, what pretty place is this?' said Mr. Bradshaw.

'This is my school-room,' said Anne.

Mr. Bradshaw repressed a whistle of astonishment; but the emotion was plainly legible in his face, and Anne said, laughing,

'A lady's schoolroom, you know, should be lady-like. Besides, I wish to inspire ideas of taste, refinement, and self-respect in these children. I wish learning to be associated with the idea of elegance and beauty.'

They ascended the steps, and entered a large room, surrounded on three sides by black boards. The floor was covered with white matting, and the walls hung with very pretty pictures of French lithographs, tastefully coloured. In some places cards were hung up, bearing quotations of Scripture. There were rows of neat desks, before each of which there was a little chair. Anne stepped to the door and rang a bell, and in about ten minutes the patter of innumerable little feet was heard ascending the steps, and presently they came streaming in—all ages, from four or five to fifteen, and from the ebony complexion of the negro, with its closely-curling wool, to the rich brown cheek of the quadroon, with melancholy, lustrous eyes, and waving hair. All were dressed alike, in a neat uniform of some kind of blue stuff, with white capes and aprons. They filed in to the tune of one of those marked rhythmical melodies which characterise the negro music, and, moving in exact time to the singing, assumed their seats, which were arranged with regard to their age and size. As soon as they were seated, Anne, after a moment's pause, clapped her hands, and the whole school commenced a morning hymn, in a quartet, which was sung so beautifully that Mr. Bradshaw, quite overpowered, stood with tears in his eyes. Anne nodded at Nina, and cast on him a satisfied glance. After that there was a rapid review of the classes. There was reading, spelling, writing on the black board; and the smaller ones were formed in groups in two adjoining apartments, under the care of some of the older girls. Anne walked about superintending the whole; and Nina, who saw the scene for the first time, could not repress exclamations of delight.

The scholars were evidently animated by the presence of company, and anxious to do credit to the school and teacher; and the two hours passed rapidly away. Anne exhibited to Mr. Bradshaw specimens of the proficiency of her scholars in handwriting and the drawing of maps, and even the copying of small lithograph cards, which contained a series of simple drawing patterns. Mr. Bradshaw seemed filled with astonishment.

'Pon my word,' he said, 'these are surprising! Miss Anne, you are a veritable magician—a worker of miracles! You must have found Aaron's rod again! My dear madam, you run the risk of being burned for a witch!'

'Very few, Mr. Bradshaw, know how much of beauty lies sealed up in this neglected race,' said Anne, with enthusiasm.

As they were walking back to the house, Mr. Bradshaw fell a little behind, and his face wore a thoughtful and almost sad expression.

'Well,' said Anne, looking round, 'a penny for your thoughts!'

'O, I see, Miss Anne, you are for pursuing your advantage. I see triumph in your eyes. But yet,' he added, 'after all this display, the capability of your children makes me feel sad. To what end is it? What purpose will it serve, except to unfit them for their inevitable condition—to make them discontented and unhappy?'

'Well,' replied Anne, 'there ought to be no inevitable condition that makes it necessary to dwarf a human mind. Any condition which makes a full development of the powers that God has given us a misfortune cannot, certainly, be a healthy one—cannot be right. If a mind will grow and rise, make way and let it. Make room for it, and cut down everything that stands in the way!'

'That's terribly levelling doctrine, Miss Anne.'

'Let it level, then!' said Anne. 'I don't care. I come from the old Virginia cavalier blood, and am not afraid of anything.'

'But, Miss Anne, how do you account for it, that the best-educated and best-treated slaves—in fact, as you say, the most perfectly-developed human beings—were those who got up the insurrection in Charleston?

‘How do you account for it,’ said Anne, ‘that the best-developed and finest specimens of men have been those that have got up insurrections in Italy, Austria, and Hungary?’

‘Well, you admit, then,’ said Mr. Bradshaw, ‘that if you say A in this matter, you’ve got to say B.’

‘Certainly,’ said Anne, ‘and when the time comes to say B, I’m ready to say it. I admit, Mr. Bradshaw, it’s a very dangerous thing to get up steam, if you don’t intend to let the boat go; but when the steam is high enough, let her go, say I.’

‘Yes; but, Miss Anne, other people don’t want to say so. The fact is, we are not all of us ready to let the boat go. It’s got all our property in it—all we have to live on. If you are willing yourself, so far as your people are concerned, they’ll inevitably want liberty, and you say you’ll be ready to give it to them; but your fires will raise steam on our plantations, and we must shut down these escape-valves. Don’t you see? Now, for my part I’ve been perfectly charmed with this school of yours; but, after all, I can’t help inquiring whereto it will grow?’

‘Well, Mr. Bradshaw,’ said Anne, ‘I’m obliged to you for the frankness of this conversation; it’s very friendly and sincere. I think, however, I shall continue to compliment the good sense and gallantry of this state, by ignoring its unworthy and unchristian laws. I will endeavour, nevertheless, to be more careful and guarded as to the manner of what I do; but, if I should be put into the penitentiary, Mr. Bradshaw, I hope you’ll call on me.’

‘Miss Anne, I beg ten thousand pardons for that unfortunate allusion.’

‘I think,’ said Anne, ‘I shall impose it as a penance upon you to stay and spend the day with us, and then I’ll show you my rose garden. I have great counsel to hold with you on the training of a certain pillar-rose. You see my design is to get you involved in my treason. You’ve already come into complicity with it by visiting my school.’

‘Thank you, Miss Anne; I should be only too much honoured to be your abettor in any treason you might meditate. But really I’m a most unlucky dog! Think of my having four bachelor friends engaged to dine with me, and so being obliged to decline your tempting offer! In fact, I must take horse before the sun gets any hotter.’

‘There he goes, for a good-hearted creature as he is!’ said Anne.

‘Do you know,’ said Nina, laughing, ‘that I thought that he was some poor, desperate mortal who was on the verge of a proposal this morning, and I ran away like a good girl, to give him a fair field?’

‘Child,’ said Anne, ‘you are altogether too late in the day. Mr. Bradshaw and I walked that little figure some time ago, and now he is one of the most convenient and agreeable of friends.’

‘Anne, why in the world don’t you get in love with somebody?’ said Nina.

‘My dear, I think there was something or other left out when I was made up,’ said Anne, laughing; ‘but I never had much of a fancy for the lords of creation. They do tolerably well till they come to be lovers; but then they are perfectly unbearable. Lions in love, my dear, don’t appear to advantage, you know. I can’t marry papa or Edward, and they have spoiled me for everybody else. Besides, I’m happy, and what do I want of any of them? Can’t there be, now and then, a woman sufficient to herself? But, Nina, dear, I’m sorry that our affairs here are giving offence and making uneasiness.’

‘For my part,’ said Nina, ‘I should go right on. I have noticed that people try all they can to stop a person who is taking an unusual course; and when they are perfectly certain that they can’t stop them, then they turn round and fall in with them; and I think that will be the case with you.’

‘They certainly will have an opportunity of trying,’ said Anne; ‘but there is Dulcimer coming up the avenue with the letter-bag. Now, child, I don’t believe you appreciate half my excellence, when you consider that I used to have all these letters that fall to you every mail.’

At this moment Dulcimer rode up to the veranda-steps, and deposited the letter-bag in Anne’s hands.

‘What an odd name you have given him!’ said Nina. ‘And what a comical-looking fellow he is! He has a sort of waggish air that reminds me of a crow.’

‘O, Dulcimer don’t belong to our régime,’ said Anne. ‘He was the prime minister and favourite under the former reign,—a sort of licensed court-jester, and to this day he hardly knows how to do anything but sing and dance; and so brother, who is for allowing the largest liberty to everybody, imposes on him only such general and light tasks as suit his roving nature. But there,' she said, throwing a letter on Nina's lap, and at the same time breaking the seal of one directed to herself.

'Ah! I thought so! You see, puss, Edward has some law business that takes him to this part of the state forthwith. Was ever such convenient law business? We may look for him to-night. Now there will be rejoicings! How now, Dulcimer, I thought you had gone,' she said, looking up, and observing that personage still lingering in the shade of a tulip-tree near the veranda.

'Please, Miss Anne, is Master Clayton coming home to-night?'

'Yes, Dulcimer; so now go and spread the news; for that's what you want, I know.'

And Dulcimer, needing no second suggestion, was out of sight in the shrubbery in a few moments.

'Now, I'll wager,' said Anne, 'that creature will get up something or other extraordinary for this evening.'

'Such as what?' said Nina.

'Well, he is something of a troubadour, and I shouldn't wonder if he should be cudgelling his brain at this moment for a song. We shall have some kind of operatic performance, you may be sure.'

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE TROUBADOUR.

ABOUT five o'clock in the evening Nina and Anne amused themselves with setting a fancy tea-table on the veranda. Nina had gathered a quantity of the leaves of the live oak, which she possessed a particular faculty for plaiting in long, flat wreaths, and with these she garlanded the social round table after it had been draped in its snowy linen, while Anne was busily arranging fruit in dishes with vine-leaves.

'Lettice will be in despair to-night,' said Anne, looking up, and smiling at a neatly-dressed brown mulatto girl, who stood looking on with large lustrous eyes. 'Her occupation's gone!'

'O, Lettice must allow me to show my accomplishments,' said Nina. 'There are some household arts that I have quite a talent for. If I had lived in what's-its-name, there, that they used to tell me about, in old times—Arcadia—I should have made a good housekeeper, for nothing suits me better than making wreaths and arranging bouquets. My nature is dressy. I want to dress everything. I want to dress tables, and dress vases, and adorn dishes, and dress handsome women, Anne, so look out for yourself, for when I have done crowning the table, I shall crown you!

As Nina talked, she was flitting hither and thither, taking up and laying down flowers and leaves, shaking out long sprays, and fluttering from place to place like a bird.

‘O yes!’ said Nina. ‘When I was a child, I remember there was an old torn translation of a book called “Gesner’s Idyls,” that used to lie about the house, and I used to read in it most charming little stories about handsome shepherds dressed in white, playing on silver and ivory flutes, and shepherdesses with azure mantles and floating hair; and people living on such delightful things as cool curds and milk, and grapes, and strawberries, and peaches. And there was no labour, and no trouble, and no dirt, and no care. Everybody lived like the flowers and the birds—growing and singing, and being beautiful. Ah, dear! I have never got over wanting it since! Why couldn’t it be so?’

‘It’s a thousand pities,’ said Anne. ‘But what constant fight we have to maintain for order and beauty!’

‘Yes,’ said Nina; ‘and what seems worse, beauty itself becomes dirt in a day. Now, these roses that we are arranging: to-morrow or next day we shall call them litter, and wish somebody would sweep them out of the way. But I never want to be the one to do that. I want some one to carry away the withered flowers, and wash the soiled vases; but I want to be the one to cut the fresh roses every day. If I were in an association, I should take that for my part. I’d arrange all their flowers through the establishment, but I should stipulate expressly that I should do no clearing up.’

‘Well,’ said Anne, ‘it’s really a mystery to me what a constant downward tendency there is to everything—how everything is gravitating back, as you may say, into disorder. Now, I think a cleanly, sweet, tasteful house—and, above all, table—are amongst the highest works of art. And yet, how everything attacks you when you set out to attain it—flies, cockroaches, ants, mosquitos! And, then, it seems to be the fate of all human beings that they are constantly wearing out and disarranging and destroying all about them.’

'Yes,' said Nina, 'I couldn't help thinking of that when we were at the camp-meeting. The first day I was perfectly charmed. Everything was so fresh, so cool, so dewy, and sweet, but by the end of the second day they had thrown egg-shells and pea-pods, and melon-rinds, and all sorts of abominations round about the tents, and it was really shocking to contemplate.'

'How disgusting!' said Anne.

'Now, I'm one of that sort,' said Nina, 'that love order dearly, but don't want the trouble of it myself. My prime minister, aunt Katy, thanks to mamma, is an excellent hand to keep it, and I encourage her in it with all my heart, so that any part of the house where I don't go much is in beautiful order. But, bless me, I should have to be made over again before I could do like aunt Nesbit! Did you ever see her take a pair of gloves or a collar out of a drawer? She gets up, and walks so moderately across the room, takes the key from under the napkin on the right-hand side of the bureau, and unlocks the drawer as gravely as though she was going to offer a sacrifice. Then, if her gloves are the back side, underneath something else, she takes out one thing after another so moderately. And then, when the gloves or collar are found, lays everything back exactly where it was before, locks the drawer, and puts the key back under the towel. And all this she'd do if anybody was dying, and she had to go for the doctor! The consequence is, that her room, her drawers, and everything, are a standing sermon to me. But I think I've got to be a much calmer person than I am, before this will come to pass in my case. I'm always in such a breeze and flutter! I fly to my drawer, and scatter things into little whirlwinds; ribbons, scarf, flowers—everything flies out in a perfect rainbow. It seems as if I should die if I didn't get the thing I wanted that minute. And, after two or three such attacks on a drawer, then comes repentance, and a long time of rolling up and re-arranging, and talking to little naughty Nina, who always promises herself to keep better order in future. But, my dear, she doesn't do it, I'm sorry to say, as yet, though perhaps there are hopes of her in future. Tell me, Anne,—you are not stiff and poky, and yet you seem to be endowed with the gift of order,—how did it come about?

'It was not natural to me, I assure you,' said Anne; 'it was a second nature drilled into me by mamma.'

'Mamma! ah, indeed!' said Nina, giving a sigh; 'then you are very happy. But come, now, Lettice, I've done with all these; take them away. My tea-table has risen out of them like the world out of chaos,' she said, as she swept together a heap of rejected vines, leaves, and flowers. 'Ah! I always have a repenting turn when I've done arranging vases, to think I've picked so many more than were necessary. The poor flowers droop their leaves and look at me reproachfully, as if they said, "You didn't want us; why couldn't you have left us alone?"'

'Oh,' said Anne, 'Lettice will relieve you of that. She has great talents in the floral line, and out of these she will arrange quantities of bouquets,' she said, as Lettice, blushing perceptibly through her brown skin, stooped and swept up the rejected flowers into her apron.

'What have we here?' said Anne, as Dulcimer, attired with most unusual care, came bowing up the steps, presenting a note on a waiter. 'Dear me, how stylish! gilt-edged paper, smelling of myrrh and ambergris,' she continued, as she broke the seal. 'What's this?—"The Magnolia Grove troubadours request the presence of Mr. and Miss Clayton, and Miss Gordon, at an operatic performance, which will be given this evening, at eight o'clock, in the Grove." Very well done. I fancy some of my scholars have been busy with the writing. Dulcimer, we shall be happy to come.'

'Where upon earth did he pick up those phrases?' said Nina, when he had departed.

'Oh,' said Anne, 'I told you that he was prime favourite of the former proprietor, who used to take him with him wherever he travelled, as people sometimes will a pet monkey; and I dare say he has lounged round the lobbies of many an opera-house. I told you he was going to get up something.'

'What a delightful creature he must be!' said Nina.

'Perhaps so to you,' said Anne, 'but he is a troublesome person to manage. He is as wholly destitute of any moral organs as a jackdaw. One sometimes questions whether these creatures have any more than a reflected mimicry of a human soul, such as the German stories imagine in cobolds and water-spirits. All I can see in Dulcimer is a kind of fun-loving animal. He don't seem to have any moral nature.'

'Perhaps,' said Nina, 'his moral nature is something like the cypress-vine seeds which I planted three months ago, and which have just come up.'

'Well, I believe Edward expects to see it along one of these days,' said Anne. 'His faith in human nature is unbounded. I think it one of his foibles, for my part; but yet I try to have hopes of Dulcimer, that some day or other he will have some glimmering perceptions of the difference between a lie and the truth, and between his own things and other people's. At present he is the most lawless marauder in the place. He has been so used to having his wit to cover a multitude of sins, that it's difficult for a scolding to make any impression on him. But, hark! isn't that a horse? Somebody is coming up the avenue.'

Both listened. 'There are two,' said Nina.

Just at this instant Clayton emerged to view, accompanied by another rider, who, on nearer view, turned out to be Frank Russel. At the same instant, the sound of violins and banjos was heard, and, to Anne's surprise, a gaily-dressed procession of servants and children began to file out from the grove, headed by Dulcimer and several of his associates, playing and singing.

'There,' said Anne, 'didn't I tell you so? There's the beginning of Dulcimer's operations.'

The air was one of those inexpressibly odd ones, whose sharp, metallic accuracy of rhythm seems to mark the delight with which the negro race feel in that particular element of music. The words, as usual, amounted to very little. Nina and Anne could hear,

'O, I see de mas'r comin' up de track,
His horse's heels do clatter, with a clack, clack, clack.'

The idea conveyed in these lines being still further carried out by the regular clapping of hands at every accented note, while every voice joined in the chorus:

'Sing, boys, sing; de mas'r is come!
Give three cheers, for de good man at home!
Ho! he! ho! hurra! hurra!'

Clayton acknowledged the compliment, as he came up, by bowing from his horse, and the procession arranged itself in a kind of lane, through which he and his companion rode up to the veranda.

'Pon my word,' said Frank Russel, 'I wasn't prepared for such a demonstration. Quite a presidential reception.'

When Clayton came to the steps and dismounted, a dozen sprang eagerly forward to take his horse, and in the crowding round for a word of recognition the order of the procession was entirely broken. After many kind words and inquiries in every direction for a few moments, the people quietly retired leaving the master to his own enjoyments.

‘You really have made quite a triumphal entry,’ said Nina.

‘Dulcimer always exhausts himself on all such occasions,’ said Anne, ‘so that he isn’t capable of any further virtue for two or three weeks.’

‘Well, take him while he is in flower, then,’ said Russel. ‘But how perfectly cool and inviting you look! really, quite idyllic. We must, certainly, have got into a fairy queen’s castle.’

‘But you must show us somewhere to shake the dust off our feet,’ said Clayton.

‘Yes,’ said Anne: ‘there’s auft Praw waiting to show you your room. Go and make yourselves as fascinating as you can.’

In a little while the gentlemen returned, in fresh white linen suits, and the business of the tea-table proceeded with alacrity.

‘Well, now,’ said Anne, after tea, looking at her watch, ‘I must inform the company that we are all engaged to the opera this evening.’

‘Yes,’ said Nina; ‘the Magnolia Grove opera-house is to be opened, and the magnolia troubadour troupe to appear for the first time.’

At this moment they were surprised by the appearance below the veranda of Dulcimer with three of his coloured associates, all wearing white ribbons in their button-holes, and carrying white wands tied with satin ribbon, and gravely arranging themselves two and two on each side of the steps.

‘Why, Dulcimer, what’s this?’ said Clayton.

Dulcimer bowed with the gravity of a raven, and announced that the committee had come to wait on the gentlemen and ladies to their seats.

‘Oh,’ said Anne, ‘we were not prepared for our part of the play!’

‘What a pity I didn’t bring my opera-hat!’ said Nina. ‘Never mind,’ she said, snatching a spray of multiflora rose, ‘this will do.’

And she gave it one twist round her head, and her toilet was complete.

‘Pon my word, that’s soon done,’ said Frank Russel, as he watched the coronet of half-opened buds and roses.

‘Yes,’ said Nina. ‘Sit down, Anne, I forgot your crown. There, wait a moment; let me turn this leaf a little, and weave these buds in there—so. Ho, you are a Baltimore belle, to be sure! Now for the procession.'

The opera-house for the evening was an open space in the grove behind the house. Lamps had been hung up in the trees, twinkling on the glossy foliage. A sort of booth or arbor was built of flowers and leaves at one end, to which the party were marshalled in great state. Between two magnolia trees a white curtain was hung up; and the moment the family party made their appearance, a chorus of voices from behind the scenes began an animated song of welcome. As soon as the party was seated, the curtain rose; and the chorus, consisting of about thirty of the best singers, males and females, came forward, dressed in their best holiday costume; singing, and keeping step as they sung, and bearing in their hands bouquets, which, as they marched round the circle, they threw at the feet of the company. A wreath of orange-blossoms was significantly directed at Nina, and fell right into her lap.

'These people seem to have had their eyes open. Coming events cast their shadows before,' said Russel.

After walking around, the chorus seated themselves at the side of the area, and the space behind was filled up with a dense sea of heads—all the servants and plantation hands.

'I declare,' said Russel, looking round on the crowd of dark faces, 'this sable crowd is turning a silver lining with a witness! How neat and pretty that row of children looks!'

And, as he spoke, a procession of the children of Anne's school came filing round in the same manner that the other had done, singing their school-songs, and casting flowers before the company. After this, they seated themselves on low seats in front of all the others. Dulcimer and four of his companions now came into the centre.

'There,' said Anne, 'Dulcimer is going to be the centre-piece. He is the troubadour.'

Dulcimer, in fact, commenced a kind of recitative to the tune 'Mas'r's in the cold, cold ground.' After singing a few lines, the quartet took up the chorus, and their voices were really magnificent.

'Why,' said Nina, 'it seems to me they are beginning in a very doleful way.'

'Oh,' said Anne, 'wait a minute. This is the old mas'r, I fancy. We shall soon hear the tune changed.'

And accordingly Dulcimer, striking into a new tune, began to rehearse the coming-in of a new master.

'There,' said Anne, 'now for a catalogue of Edward's virtues. They must be all got in rhyme or no rhyme.'

Dulcimer kept on rehearsing. Every four lines the quartet struck in with the chorus, which was then repeated by the whole company, clapping their hands and stamping their feet to the time with great vivacity.

'Now, Anne, is coming your turn,' said Nina, as Dulcimer launched out, in most high-flown strains, on the beauty of Miss Anne.

'Yes,' said Clayton, 'the catalogue of your virtues will be somewhat extensive.'

'I shall escape, at any rate,' said Nina.

'Don't you be too sure,' said Anne. 'Dulcimer has had his eye on you ever since you've been here.'

And true enough, after the next stanza, Dulcimer assumed a peculiarly meaning expression.

'There,' said Anne, 'do see the wretch flirting himself out like a saucy crow. It's coming! Now, look out, Nina!'

With a waggish expression from the corner of his downcast eyes, he sung,

'O, mas'r is often absent—do you know where he goes? |
He goes to North Carolina, for de North Carolina rose.'

'There you are!' said Frank Russel. 'Do you see the grin going round? What a lot of ivory! They are coming in this chorus strong!'

And the whole assembly, with great animation, poured out on the chorus,

'O, de North Carolina rose!
O, de North Carolina rose!
We wish good luck to mas'r,
With de North Carolina rose!'

This chorus was repeated with enthusiasm, clapping of hands, and laughing.

'I think the North Carolina Rose ought to rise,' said Russel.

'Oh, hush!' said Anne. 'Dulcimer hasn't done yet.'

Assuming an attitude, Dulcimer turned and sang to one of his associates in the quartet—

'O, I see two stars a rising
Up in de shady skies!'

To which the other responded with animation,

No, boy, you are mistaken,
'Tis de light of her fair eyes!'

'That's thorough, at any rate,' said Russel.
While Dulcimer went on—

'O, I see two roses blowing Togeder on one bed !'

And the other responded—

'No, boy, you are mistaken,
Dem are her cheeks so red.'

'And they are getting redder,' said Anne, tapping Nina with her fan. 'Dulcimer is evidently laying out his strength upon you, Nina.'

Dulcimer went on singing—

'O, I see a grape-vine running,
With its curly rings up dere !'

And the response—

'No, boy, you are mistaken,
'Tis her rings of curly hair !'

And the quartet here struck up—

'O, she walks on de veranda,
And she laughs out of de door,
And she dancés like de sunshine
Across de parlor floor.
Her little feet dey patter,
Like de rain upon de flowers;
And her laugh is like sweet waters,
Through all de summer hours !'

'Dulcimer has had help from some of the muses along there,' said Clayton, looking at Anne.

'Hush !' said Anne, 'hear the chorus.'

'O, de North Carolina rose !
O, de North Carolina rose !
O, plant by our veranda
De North Carolina rose !'

This chorus was repeated with three times three, and the whole assembly broke into a general laugh, when the performers bowed and retired, and the white sheet, which was fastened by a pulley to the limb of a tree, was let down again.

'Come, now, Anne, confess that wasn't all Dulcimer's work,' said Clayton.

'Well, to tell the truth,' said Anne, 'twas got up between him and Lettice, who has a natural turn for versifying, quite extraordinary. If I choose to encourage and push her on, she might turn out a second Phillis Wheatly.'

Dulcimer and his coadjutors now came round, bearing trays with lemonade, cake, sliced pine-apples, and some other fruits.

'Well, on my word,' said Russel, 'this is quite prettily got up.'

'Oh, I think,' said Clayton, 'the African race evidently are made to excel in that department which lies between the sensuous and the intellectual—what we call the elegant arts. These require rich and abundant animal nature, such as they possess; and if ever they become highly civilised, they will excel in music, dancing, and elocution.'

'I have often noticed,' said Anne, 'in my scholars, how readily they seize upon anything which pertains to the department of music and language. The negroes are sometimes laughed at for mispronouncing words, which they will do in a very droll manner; but it's only because they are so taken with the sounds of words, that they will try to pronounce beyond the sphere of their understanding, like bright children.'

'Some of these voices here are perfectly splendid,' said Russel.

'Yes,' said Anne, 'we have one or two girls on the place who have that rich contralto voice which, I think, is oftener to be found among them than among whites.'

'The Ethiopian race is a slow-growing plant, like the aloe,' said Clayton; 'but I hope, some of these days, they'll come into flower; and I think, if they ever do, the blossoming will be gorgeous.'

'That will do for a poet's expectation,' said Russel.

The performance now gave place to a regular dancing-party, which went on with great animation, yet decorum.

'Religious people,' said Clayton, 'who have instructed the negroes, I think, have wasted a great deal of their energy in persuading them to give up dancing and singing songs. I try to regulate the propensity. There is no use in trying to make the negroes into Anglo-Saxons, any more than making a grape-vine into a pear-tree. I train the grape-vine.'

'Behold,' said Russel, 'the successful champion of negro rights!'

'Not so very successful,' said Clayton. 'I suppose you've heard my case has been appealed; so that my victory isn't so certain, after all.'

'O,' said Nina, 'yes, it must be! I'm sure no person of common sense would decide any other way; and your own father is one of the judges, too.'

'That will make him the more careful not to be influenced in my favour,' said Clayton.

The dancing now broke up, and the servants dispersed in an orderly manner, and the company returned to the veranda, which lay pleasantly checkered with the light of the moon falling through trailing vines. The air was full of those occasional pulsations of fragrance which rise in the evening from flowers.

'O, how delightful,' said Nina, 'this fragrance of the honey-suckles! I have a perfect passion for perfumes! They seem to me like spirits in the air.'

'Yes,' said Clayton, 'Lord Bacon says, "that the breath of flowers comes and goes in the air, like the warbling of music."'

'Did Lord Bacon say that?' said Nina, in a tone of surprise.

'Yes; why not?' said Clayton.

'O, I thought he was one of those musty old philosophers who never thought of anything pretty!'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'then to-morrow let me read you his essay on gardens, and you'll find musty old philosophers often do think of pretty things.'

'It was Lord Bacon,' said Anne, 'who always wanted musicians playing in the next room while he was composing.'

'He did?' said Nina. 'Why, how delightful of him! I think I should like to hear some of his essays.'

'There are some minds,' said Clayton, 'large enough to take in everything. Such men can talk as prettily of a ring on a lady's finger, as they can wisely on the courses of the planets. Nothing escapes them.'

'That's the kind of man you ought to have for a lover, Anne,' said Nina, laughing; 'you have weight enough to risk it. I'm such a little wisk of thistle-down that it would annihilate me. Such a ponderous weight of wisdom attached to me would drag me under water, and drown me. I should let go my line, I think, if I felt such a fish bite.'

'You are tolerably safe in our times,' said Clayton; 'Nature only sends such men once in a century or two. They are the road-makers for the rest of the world. They are quarry-masters, that quarry out marble enough for a generation to work up.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'I shouldn't want to be a quarry-master's wife. I should be afraid that some of his blocks would fall on me.'

'Why, wouldn't you like it, if he were wholly your slave?' said Frank Russel. 'It would be like having the genius of the lamp at your feet.'

'Ah!' said Nina, 'if I could keep him my slave; but I'm afraid he'd outwit me at last. Such a man would soon put me upon the shelf for a book read through. I've seen some great men,—I mean great for our times,—and they didn't seem to care half as much for their wives as they did for a newspaper.'

'O,' said Anne, 'that's past praying for with any husband. The newspaper is the standing rival of the American lady. It must be a warm lover that can be attracted from it, even before he is secure of his prize.'

'You are severe, Miss Anne,' said Russel.

'She only speaks the truth. You men are a bad set,' said Nina; 'you are a kind of necessary evil, half-civilized at best. But if ever I set up an establishment, I shall insist upon taking precedence of the newspaper.'

CHAPTER XXX.

TIFF'S GARDEN.

WOULD the limits of our story admit of it, we should gladly linger many days in the shady precincts of Magnolia Grove, where Clayton and Nina remained some days longer, and where the hours flew by on flowery feet; but the inevitable time and tide, which wait for no man, wait not for the narrator. We must therefore say in brief, that when the visit was concluded, Clayton accompanied Nina once more to Canema, and returned to the circle of his own duties. Nina returned to her own estate, with views somewhat chastened and modified by her acquaintance with Anne. As Clayton supposed, the influence of a really great purpose in life had proved of more weight than exhortations, and she began to feel within herself positive aspirations for some more noble and worthy life than she had heretofore led. That great, absorbing feeling, which determines the whole destiny of woman's existence, is in its own nature an elevating and purifying one. It is such even when placed on an unworthy object; and much more so when the object is a worthy one.

Since the first of their friendship, Clayton had never officiously sought to interfere with the growth and development of Nina's moral nature. He had sufficient sagacity to perceive that, unconsciously to herself, a deeper power of feeling, and a wider range of thought, was opening within her; and he left the development of it to the same quiet forces which swell the rosebud and guide the climbing path of the vine. Simply and absolutely he lived his own life before her, and let hers alone; and the power of his life therefore became absolute. A few mornings after her return, she thought that she would go out and inquire after the welfare of our old friend, Tiff. It was a hazy, warm, bright summer morning, and all things lay in that dreamy stillness, that trance of voluptuous rest, which precedes the approach of the fiercer heats of the day. Since her absence there had been evident improvement in Tiff's affairs. The baby, a hearty, handsome little fellow, by dint of good nursing, pork-sucking, and lying out doors in the tending of breezes and zephyrs, had grown to be a creeping creature, and followed Tiff around, in his garden ministrations, with unintelligible chatterings of delight. At the moment when Nina rode up, Tiff was busy with his morning work in the garden. His appearance, it is to be confessed, was somewhat peculiar. He usually wore, in compliment to his nursing duties, an apron in front; but, as his various avocations pressed hard upon his time, and as his own personal outfit was ever the last to be attended to, Tiff's nether garments had shown traces of that frailty which is incident to all human things.

'Bress me,' he said to himself, that morning, as he with difficulty engineered his way into them, 'holes here, and holes dar! Don't want but two holes in my breeches, and I's got two dozen! Got my foot through de wrong place! Poor old Tiff! Laws a massy! Wish I could get hold of some of dem dar clothes dey were telling 'bout at de camp-meeting, dey wore forty years in de wilderness! 'Mazing handy dem ar times was! Well, anyhow, I'll tie an apron behind, and another in front. Bress de Lord, I's got aprons anyhow! I must make up a par of breeches, some of dese yer days, when the baby's teeth is all through, and Teddy's clothes don't want no mending, and de washing is done, and dese yer weeds stops a growing in de garden. 'Bress if I know what de Lord want so many weeds. 'Pears, like dey comes just to plague us; but den we doesn't know. May be dere's some good in 'em. We doesn't know but a leetle, no way.'

Tiff was sitting on the ground weeding one of his garden-beds, when he was surprised by the apparition of Nina on horseback, coming up to the gate. Here was a dilemma to be sure! No cavalier had a more absolute conception of the nature of politeness, and the claims of beauty, rank, and fashion, than Tiff. Then, to be caught sitting on the ground, with a blue apron on in front, and a red one on behind, was an appalling dilemma. However, as our readers may have discovered, Tiff had that essential requisite of good breeding, the moral courage to face an exigency; and, wisely considering that a want of cordiality is a greater deficiency than the want of costume, he rose up without delay, and hastened to the gate to acknowledge the honour.

'Lord bress your sweet face, Miss Nina!' he said, while the breezes flapped and fluttered his red and blue sails. 'Old Tiff's 'mazin happy to see you. Miss Fanny's well, thank ye; and Mas'r Teddy and the baby all doing nicely, bress de Lord. Miss Nina, be so good as to get down and come in. I'se got some nice berries dat I picked in de swamp, and Miss Fanny 'll be proud to have you take some. You see,' he said, laughing heartily, and regarding his peculiar costume, 'I wasn't looking for any quality long dis yer time o' day, so I just got on my old clothes.'

'Why, uncle Tiff, I think they become you immensely!' said Nina. 'Your outfit is really original and picturesque. You're not one of the people that are ashamed of their work, are you, uncle Tiff? So, if you just lead my horse to that stump, I'll get down.'

'Laws, no, Miss Nina!' said Tiff, as with alacrity he obeyed her orders. 'Spects if old Tiff was 'shamed of work, he'd have a heap to be 'shamed of, cause it's pretty much all work with him. 'Tis so!'

'Tomtit pretended to come with me,' said Nina, as she looked round, 'but he lagged behind by the brook to get some of those green grapes, and I suspect it's the last I shall see of him. So, Tiff, if you please to tie Sylphine in the shade, I'll go in to see Miss Fanny.'

And Nina tripped lightly up the walk, now bordered on either side by China asters and marigolds, to where Fanny was standing bashfully in the door waiting for her. In her own native woods this child was one of the boldest, freest, and happiest of romps. There was scarce an eligible tree which she could not climb, or a thicket she had not explored. She was familiar with every flower, every bird, every butterfly of the vicinity. She knew precisely when every kind of fruit would ripen and flower would blossom; and was so au fait in the language of birds and squirrels, that she might almost have been considered one of the fraternity. Her only companion and attendant, old Tiff, had that quaint, fanciful, grotesque nature which is the furthest possible removed from vulgarity; and his frequent lectures on proprieties and conventionalities, his long and prolix narrations of her ancestral glories and distinctions, had succeeded in infusing into her a sort of childish consciousness of dignity, while at the same time it inspired her with a bashful awe of those whom she saw surrounded with the actual insignia and circumstances of position and fortune. After all, Tiff's method of education, instinctive as it was, was highly philosophical, since a certain degree of self-respect is the nurse of many virtues, and a shield from many temptations. There is also something, perhaps, in the influence of descent. Fanny certainly inherited from her mother a more delicate organization than generally attends her apparent station in life. She had, also, what perhaps belongs to the sex, a capability of receiving the mysteries and proprieties of dress; and Nina, as she stood on the threshold of the single low room, could not but be struck with the general air of refinement which characterized both it and its little mistress. There were flowers from the swamps and hedges arranged with care and taste, feathers of birds, strings of eggs of different colour, dried grasses, and various little woodland curiosities, which showed a taste refined by daily intercourse with nature. Fanny herself was arrayed in a very pretty print dress, which her father had brought home in a recent visit, with a cape of white muslin. Her brown hair was brushed smoothly from her forehead, and her clear blue eyes, and fair, rosy complexion, gave her a pleasing air of intelligence and refinement.

'Thank you,' said Nina, as Fanny offered her the only chair the establishment afforded; 'but I'm going with Tiff out in the garden. I never can bear to be in the house such days as this. You didn't expect me over so early, uncle Tiff; but I took a notable turn this morning, and routed them up to an early breakfast, on purpose that I might have time to get over here before the heat came on. It's pleasant out here, now the shadow of the woods falls across the garden so. How beautifully those trees wave! Tiff, go on with your work—never mind me.'

'Yes, Miss Nina, it's mighty pleasant. Why, I was out in dis yer garden at four o'clock dis morning, and 'peared like dese yer trees was waving like a psalm, so sort o' still, you know! Kind o' spreading out der hands like dey'd have prayers; and dere was a mighty handsome star a looking down. 'I spects dat ar star is one of de very oldest families up 'der.'

'Most likely,' said Nina cheerily. 'They call it Venus, the star of love, uncle Tiff; and I believe that is a very old family.'

'Love is a mighty good ting, anyhow,' said Tiff. 'Lord bless you, Miss Nina, it makes everyting go kind o' easy. Sometimes, when I am studding upon dese yer tings, I says to myself, 'pears like de trees in de wood, dey loves each oder. Dey stands kind o' locking arms so, and dey kind o' nod der heads, and whispers so. 'Pears like de grape-vines, and de birds, and all dem ar tings, dey lives comfortable togeder, like dey was peaceable, and liked each oder. Now, folks is apt to get a stewin' and a frettin' round, and turnin up der noses at dis yer ting, and dat ar; but 'pears like de Lord's works takes everyting mighty easy. Dey just kind o' lives along peaceable. I tink it's mighty 'structive!'

'Certainly it is,' said Nina. 'Old Mother Nature is an excellent manager, and always goes on making the best of everything.'

'Dere's heaps done dat ar way, and no noise,' said Tiff. 'Why, Miss Nina, I studies upon dat ar out here in my garden. Why, look at dat ar corn, way up over your head, now! All dat ar growed dis yer summer. No noise 'bout it—'pears like nobody couldn't see when 'twas done. Dey were telling us in camp-meeting how de Lord created de heaven and de earth. Now, Miss Nina, Tiff has his own thoughts, you know. And Tiff says, 'pears like de Lord is creating de heaven and de earth all de time. 'Pears like you can see Him a doing of it right afore your face; and dem growing tings are so curus, Miss Nina! 'Pears for all de world like as if dey was critters! 'Pears like each of 'em has der own way, and won't go no oder! Dese yer beans, dey will come up so curus right top o' de stalks; dey will turn round de pole one way, and, if you was to tie 'em, you couldn't make 'em go round t'oder! Dey's set in der own way, dey is, for all dey's so still 'bout it! Laws, Miss Nina, dese yer tings makes Tiff laugh—does so!' he said, sitting down, and indulging in one of his fits of merriment.

'You are quite a philosopher, Tiff,' said Nina.

'Laws, Miss Nina, I hopes not!' said Tiff, solemnly; 'cause one of de preachers at de camp-meeting used up dem folk terrible, I tell you! Dat ar-pretty much all I could make out of de sermon, dat people mustn't be 'losophers! Laws, Miss Nina, I hope I an't no sich!'

'O, I mean the good kind, uncle Tiff. But how were you pleased, upon the whole, at the camp-meeting?' said Nina.

'Well,' said Tiff, 'Miss Nina, I hope I got something—I don't know fairly how much 'tis. But, Miss Nina, it 'pears like as if you had come out here to instruct us 'bout dese yer tings. Miss Fanny, she don't read very well yet, and 'pears like if you could read us some out of de Bible, and teach us how to be Christians.'

'Why, Tiff, I scarcely know how myself,' said Nina. 'I'll send Milly to talk to you. She is a real good Christian.'

'Milly is a very nice woman,' said Tiff, somewhat doubtfully; 'but, Miss Nina, 'pears like I would rather have white teaching; 'pears like I would rather have you, if it wouldn't be too much trouble.'

'Oh, no, uncle Tiff! If you want to hear me read, I'll read to you now,' said Nina. 'Have you got a Bible here? Stay, I'll sit down. I'll take the chair and sit down in the shade, and then you needn't stop your work.'

Tiff hurried into the house to call Fanny; produced a copy of a Testament, which, with much coaxing, he had persuaded Crippa to bring on his last visit, and, while Fanny sat at her feet making larkspur rings, she turned over the pages, to think what to read. When she saw Tiff's earnest and eager attention, her heart smote her to think that the book, so valuable in his eyes, was to her almost an unread volume.

'What shall I read to' you, Tiff? what do you want to hear?'

'Well, I want's to find out de shortest way I ken, how dese yer chil'en's to be got to heaven,' said Tiff. 'Dis yer world is mighty well, long as it holds out; but den, yer see, it don't last for ever! tings is passing away!'

Nina thought a moment. The great question of questions, so earnestly proposed to her! The simple, childlike old soul, hanging confidently on her answer! At last she said, with a seriousness quite unusual with her,

'Tiff, I think the best thing I can do is to read to you about our Saviour. He came down into this world to show us the way to heaven. And I'll read you, when I come here, all that there is about Him, all he said and did; and then, perhaps, you'll see the way yourself. Perhaps,' she added, with a sigh, 'I shall too.'

As she spoke, a sudden breeze of air shook the clusters of a prairie-rose, which was climbing into the tree under which she was sitting, and a shower of rose-leaves fell around her.

'Yes,' she said to herself, as the rose-leaves fell on her book, 'it's quite true what he says—everything is passing.'

And now, amid the murmur of the pine-trees, and the rustling of the garden-vines, came on the ear of the listeners the first words of that sweet and ancient story: 'Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, behold there came wise men from the East, saying, "Where is He that is born king of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship Him."'

Probably more cultivated minds would have checked the progress of the legend by a thousand questions, statistical and geographical, as to where Jerusalem was, and who the wise men were, and how far the East was from Jerusalem, and whether it was probable they would travel so far. But Nina was reading to children, and to an old child-man, in whose grotesque and fanciful nature there was yet treasured a believing sweetness, like the amulets supposed to belong to the good genii of the fairy tales. The quick fancy of her auditors made reality of the story as it went along. A cloudy Jerusalem built itself up immediately in their souls, and became as well known to them as the neighbouring town of E——. Herod, the king, became a real walking personage in their minds, with a crown on his head; and Tiff immediately discerned a resemblance between him and a certain domineering old General Eaton, who used greatly to withstand the cause of virtue, and the Peytons, in the neighbourhood where he was brought up. Tiff's indignation, when the slaughter of the innocents was narrated, was perfectly outrageous. He declared, 'He wouldn't have believed dat ar of king Herod, bad as he was!' And, good-hearted and inoffensive as Tiff was, it really seemed to afford him comfort 'dat de debil had got dat ar man 'fore now!'

'Sarves him right, too!' said Tiff, striking fiercely at a weed with his hoe, 'killing all dem por little chil'en! What harm had dey done him, any way? Wonder what he thought of hisself!'

Nina found it necessary to tranquillize the good creature, by directing his attention to the more pleasing points of the story, such as the wild night-journey of the wise men, and how the star went before them till it stood over the place where the child was. How they went in and saw the young child, and Mary his mother, and fell down before him, offering gift of gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

'Lord bless you, I wish I'd a been dar!' said Tiff. 'And dat ar chile was de Lord of Glory! Sure 'nough, Miss Nina, I hearn 'em sing dis yer hymn at de camp-meeting. You know 'bout cold on his cradle. You know it goes dis yer way.'

And Tiff sung to a kind of rocking lullaby, words whose poetic imagery had hit his fancy before he knew their meaning—

'Cold on his cradle de dew-drops are shining,
Low lies his head wid de beasts of de stall;
Angels adore him, in slumber reclining,
Maker, and Saviour, and Monarch of all.'

Nina had never realised, till she felt it in the undoubting faith of her listeners, the wild exquisite poetry of that legend which, like an immortal hily, blooms in the heart of Christianity as spotless and as tender now as eighteen hundred years ago. That child of Bethlehem, when afterwards he taught in Galilee, spoke of seed which fell into a good and honest heart: and words could not have been more descriptive of the nature which was now receiving this seed of paradise. When Nina had finished her reading, she found her own heart touched by the effect which she had produced. The nursing, child-loving old Tiff was ready, in a moment, to bow before his Redeemer, enshrined in the form of an infant; and it seemed as if the air around him had been made sacred by the sweetness of the story. As Nina was mounting her horse to return, Tiff brought out a little basketful of wild raspberries.

'Tiff wants to give you something,' he said.

'Thank you, uncle Tiff. How delightful! Now, if you'll only give me a cluster of your Michigan rose!'

Proud and happy was Tiff; and, pulling down the very topmost cluster of his rose, he presented it to her. Alas! before Nina reached home, it hung drooping from the heat. 'The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand for ever.'

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE WARNING.

IN life, organised as it is at the South, there are two currents;—one, the current of the master's fortunes, feelings, and hopes; the other, that of the slave's. It is a melancholy fact in the history of the human race, as yet, that there have been multitudes who follow the triumphal march of life only as captives to whom the voice of the trumpet, the waving of the banners, the shouts of the people, only add to the bitterness of their enthrallment. While life to Nina was daily unfolding in brighter colours, the slave brother at her side was destined to feel an additional burden on his already unhappy lot. It was toward evening, after having completed his daily cares, that he went to the post-office for the family letters. Among these, one was directed to himself, and he slowly perused it as he rode home through the woods. It was as follows:—

‘ MY DEAR BROTHER,

‘ I TOLD you how comfortably we were living in our place—I and my children. Since then, everything has been changed. Mr. Tom Gordon came here and put in a suit for the estate, and attached me and my children as slaves. He is a dreadful man. The case has been tried and gone against us. The judge said that both deeds of emancipation—both the one executed in Ohio, and the one here—were of no effect; that my boy was a slave, and could no more hold property than a mule before a plough. I had some good friends here, and people pitied me very much; but nobody could help me. Tom Gordon is a bad man—a very bad man.* I cannot tell you all that he said to me. I only tell you that I will kill myself and my children before we will be his slaves. Harry, I have been free, and I know what liberty is. My children have been brought up free, and if I can help it, they never shall know what slavery is. I have got away, and am hiding with a coloured family here in Natchez. I hope to get to Cincinnati, where I have friends. My dear Brother, I did hope to do something for you. Now I cannot. Nor can you do anything for me. The law is on the side of the oppressors; but I hope God will help us. Farewell!

‘ Your affectionate

‘ SISTER.’

It is difficult to fathom the feelings of a person brought up in a position so wholly unnatural as that of Harry. The feelings which had been cultivated in him by education, and the indulgence of his nominal possessors, were those of an honourable and gentlemanly man. His position was absolutely that of the common slave, without one legal claim to anything on earth, one legal right of protection in any relation of life. What any man of strong nature would feel on hearing such tidings from a sister, Harry felt. In a moment, there rose up before his mind the picture of Nina in all her happiness and buoyancy—in all the fortunate accessories of her lot. Had the vague thoughts which crowded on his mind been expressed in words, they might have been something like these,—

‘I have two sisters, daughters of one father, both beautiful, both amiable and good; but one has rank, and position, and wealth, and ease, and pleasure; the other is an outcast, unprotected, given up to the brutal violence of a vile and wicked man. She has been a good wife, and a good mother. Her husband has done all he could to save her; but the cruel hand of the law grasps her and her children, and hurls them back into the abyss from which it was his life-study to raise them. And I can do nothing! I am not even a man! And this curse is on me, and on my wife, and on my children and children’s children, for ever! Yes, what does the judge say in this letter? “He can no more own anything than the mule before his plough!” That’s to be the fate of every child of mine! And yet people say, You have all you want—why are you not happy? I wish they could try it! Do they think broadcloth coats and gold watches can comfort a man for all this?’

Harry rode along, with his hands clenched upon the letter, the reins dropping from the horse’s neck, in the same unfrequented path where he had twice before met Dred. Looking up, he saw him the third time, standing silently, as if he had risen from the ground.

‘Where did you come from?’ said he. ‘Seems to me you are always at hand when anything is going against me!’

‘Went not my spirit with thee?’ said Dred. ‘Have I not seen it all? It is because we will bear this, that we have to bear it, Harry.’

‘But,’ said Harry, ‘what can we do?’

‘Do? what does the wild horse do? Launch out our hoofs! rear up and come down on them! What does the rattlesnake do? Lie in their path and bite! Why did they make slaves of us? They tried the wild Indians first; why didn’t they keep to them? They wouldn’t be slaves, and we will! They that will bear the yoke, may bear it!’

‘But,’ said Harry, ‘Dred, this is all utterly hopeless. Without any means or combination, or leaders, we should only rush on to our own destruction.’

‘Let us die, then!’ said Dred. ‘What if we do die? What great matter is that? If they bruise our head, we can sting their heel! Nat Turner—they killed him! but the fear of him almost drove them to set free their slaves! Yes, it was argued among them. They came within two or three votes of it in their assembly. A little more fear, and they would have done it. If my father had succeeded, the slaves in Carolina would be free to-day. Die! why not die? Christ was crucified! Has everything dropped out of you, that you can't die—that you'll crawl like worms, for the sake of living?

'I'm not afraid of death myself,' said Harry. 'God knows I would not care if I did die; but—'

'Yes, I know,' said Dred. 'She that letteth will let, till she be taken out of the way. I tell you, Harry, there's a seal been loosed—there's a vial poured out upon the air, and the destroying angel standeth over Jerusalem, with his sword drawn!'

'What do you mean by that?' said Harry.

Dred stood silent for a moment; his frame assumed the rigid tension of a cataleptic state, and his voice sounded like that of a person speaking from a distance, yet there was a strange distinctness in it:—

'The words of the prophet, and the vision that he hath from the Lord, when he saw the vision, falling into a trance, and having his eyes open, and "behold he saw a roll flying through the heavens, and it was written, within and without, with mourning and lamentation and woe! Behold, it cometh! Behold, the slain of the Lord shall be many! they shall fall in the house and by the way! The bride shall fall in her chamber, and the child shall die in its cradle! There shall be a cry in the land of Egypt, for there shall not be a house where there is not one dead!"'

'Dred! Dred! Dred!' said Harry, pushing him by the shoulder; 'come out of this; come out. 'It's frightful!'

Dred stood looking before him, with his head inclined forward, his hand upraised, and his eyes strained, with the air of one who is trying to make out something through a thick fog.

'I see her!' he said. 'Who is that by her? His back is turned. Ah! I see; it is he. And there's Harry and Milly. Try hard, try. You won't do it. No; no use sending for the doctor. There's not one to be had. They are all too busy. Rub her hands. Yes; but it's no good. "Whom the Lord loveth he taketh away from the evil to come." Lay her down. Yes, it is death! death! death!'

Harry had often seen the strange moods of Dred, and he shuddered now, because he partook somewhat in the common superstitions which prevailed among the slaves of his prophetic power. He shook and called him, but he turned slowly away, and, with eyes that seemed to see nothing, yet guiding himself with his usual dextrous agility, he plunged again into the thickness of the swamp and was soon lost to view.

After his return home it was with a sensation of chill at his heart that he heard aunt Nesbit reading to Nina portions of a letter, describing the march through some northern cities of the cholera, which was then making fearful havoc on our American shore.

'Nobody seems to know how to manage it,' the letter said; 'physicians are all at a loss. It seems to spurn all laws. It bursts upon cities like a thunderbolt, scatters desolation and death, and is gone with equal rapidity. People rise in the morning well, and are buried before evening. In one day houses are swept of a whole family.'

'Ah!' said Harry, to himself, 'I see the meaning now; but what does it portend to us?'

How the strange foreshadowing had risen to the mind of Dred we shall not say. Whether there be mysterious electric sympathies which, floating through the air, bear dim presentiments on their wings, or whether some stray piece of intelligence had dropped on his ear and been interpreted by the burning fervor of his soul we know not. The news, however, left very little immediate impression on the daily circle at Canema. It was a dread reality in the far distance. Harry only pondered it with anxious fear.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE MORNING STAR.

NINA continued her visits to Tiff's garden on almost every pleasant morning or evening. Tiff had always some little offering, either berries or flowers, to present, or a nice little luncheon of fish or birds, cooked in some mode of peculiar delicacy; and which, served up in sylvan style, seemed to have something of the wild relish of the woods. In return, she continued to read the story so interesting to him, and it was astonishing how little explanation it needed: how plain honesty of heart and lovingness of nature interpreted passages over which theologians wrangled in vain.

It was not long before Tiff had impersonated to himself each of the disciples, particularly Peter; so that when anything was said by him Tiff would nod his head significantly, and say, 'Ah, ah! dat ar's just like him. He's allers a puttin' in, but he's a good man arter all.'

What impression was made on the sensitive young nature, through whom, as a medium, Tiff received this fresh revelation, we may, perhaps, imagine. There are times in life when the soul, like a half-grown climbing vine, hangs waving tremulously, stretching out its tendrils for something to ascend by. Such are generally the great transition periods of life, when we are passing from the ideas and conditions of one stage of existence to those of another. Such times are most favourable for the presentation of the higher truths of religion.

In the hazy slumbering stillness of that midsummer atmosphere, in the long silent rides through the pines, Nina, half-awakened from the thoughtless dreams of childhood, yearning for something nobler than she had yet lived for, thought over and resolved in her mind this beautiful and spotless image of God revealed in man which her daily readings presented; and the world that he created seemed to whisper to her in every pulsation of its air, in every breath of its flowers, in the fanning of its winds 'He still liveth and he loveth thee.'

The voice of the Good Shepherd fell on the ear of the wandering lamb, calling her to his arms; and Nina found herself one day unconsciously repeating, as she returned through the woods, words which she had often heard read at church: 'When thou saidst unto me, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek.'

Nina had often dreaded the idea of becoming a Christian, as one shrinks from the idea of a cold dreary passage which must be passed to gain a quiet home. But, suddenly, as if by some gentle invisible hand, the veil seemed to be drawn which hid the face of Almighty love from her view. She beheld the earth and the heavens transfigured in the light of his smile. A strange and unspeakable joy arose within her, as if some loving presence was always near her. It was with her when she lay down at night, and when she awoke in the morning the strange happiness had not departed. Her feelings may be best expressed by an extract from a letter which she wrote at this time to Clayton:—

'It seems to me that I have felt a greater change in me within last two months than in my whole life before. When I look back at what I was in New York, three months ago, actually I hardly know myself. It seems to me, in those old days, that life was only a frolic to me, as it is to the kitten. I don't really think there was much harm in me, only the want of good. In those days, sometimes I used to have a sort of dim longing to be better, particularly when Livy Ray was at school. It seemed as if she woke up something that had been asleep in me; but she went away, and I fell asleep again, and life went on like a dream. Then, I became acquainted with you, and you began to rouse me again, and for some time I thought I didn't like to wake; it was just as it is when one lies asleep in the morning—it's so pleasant to sleep and dream, that one resists any one who tries to bring them back to life. I used to feel quite pettish when I first knew you, and sometimes wished you'd let me alone, because I saw that you belonged to a different kind of sphere from what I'd been living in. And I had a presentiment that if I let you go on, life would have to be something more than a joke with me. But you would, like a very indiscreet man as you are, you would insist on being in sober earnest.

'I used to think that I had no heart'; I begin to think I have a good deal now. Every day it seems as if I could love more and more; and a great many things are growing clear to me that I didn't understand, and I'm growing happier every day.

'You know my queer old protégé, uncle Tiff, who lives in the woods here. For some time past I have been to his house every day, reading to him in the Testament, and it has had a very great effect on me. It affected me very much in the first place, that he seemed so very earnest about religion, when I, who ought to know so much more, was so indifferent to it; and when the old creature with tears in his eyes insisted upon it that I should show his children the road to heaven, then I began to read to him in the Testament, the life of Jesus. I didn't know myself how beautiful it was—how suited to all our wants. It seemed to me I never saw so much beauty in anything before; and it seems as if it had waked a new life in me. Everything is changed; and it is the beauty of Christ that has changed it. You know I always loved beauty above all things, in music, in nature, and in flowers; but it seems to me that I see something now in Jesus more beautiful than all. It seems as if all these had been shadows of beauty, but he is the substance. It is strange, but I have a sense of him, his living and presence, that sometimes almost overpowers me. It seems as if he had been following me always but I had not seen him. He has been a good shepherd, seeking the thoughtless lamb. He has all my life been calling me child; but till lately my heart has never answered Father! Is this religion? Is this what people mean by conversion? I tried to tell aunt Nesbit how I felt, because now I feel kinder to everybody; and really my heart smote me to think how much fun I had made of her, and now I begin to love her very much. She was so anxious I should talk with Mr. Titmarsh, because he is a minister. Well, you know I didn't want to do it, but I thought I ought to, because poor aunt really seemed to feel anxious I should. I suppose, if I were as perfect as I ought to be, a good man's stiff ways wouldn't trouble me so. But stiff people, you know, are my particular temptation. He came and made a pastoral call, the other day, and talked to me. I don't think he understood me very well, and I'm sure I didn't understand him. He told me how many kinds of faith there were, and how many kinds of love. I believe there were three kinds of faith, and two kinds of love; and he thought it was important to know whether I had got the right kind. He said we ought not to love God because he loves us, but because he is holy. He wanted to know whether I had any just views of sin, as an infinite evil; and I told him I hadn't the least idea of what infinite was; and that I hadn't any views of anything, but the beauty of Christ; that I didn't understand anything about the different sorts of faith, but that I felt perfectly sure that Jesus is so good that he would make me feel right, and give me right views, and do everything for me that I need.

'He wanted to know if I loved him because he magnified the law, and made it honourable; and I told him I didn't understand what that meant.

'I don't think, on the whole, that the talk did me much good. It only confused me, and made me very uncomfortable. But I went out to old Tiff's in the evening, and read how Jesus received the little children. You never saw anybody so delighted as old Tiff was. He got me to read it to him three or four times over; and now he gets me to read it every time I go there, and he says he likes it better than any other part of the Testament. Tiff and I get along very well together. He doesn't know any more about faith than I do, and hasn't any better views than I have. Aunt Nesbit is troubled about me because I am so happy. She says she's afraid I haven't any sense of sin. Don't you remember my telling you how happy I felt the first time I heard real music?

I thought before that, that I could sing pretty well; but in one hour all my music became trash in my eyes. And yet, I would not have missed it for the world. So it is now. That beautiful life of Jesus—so sweet, so calm, so pure, so unselfish, so perfectly natural, and yet so far beyond nature—has shown me what a poor, sinful, low creature I am; and yet I rejoice; I feel, sometimes, as I did when I first heard a full orchestra play some of Mozart's divine harmonies. I forgot that I was alive, I lost all thought of myself entirely; and I was perfectly happy. So it is now. This loveliness and beauty that I see makes me happy without any thought of myself. It seems to me, sometimes, that while I see it I never can suffer. There's another thing that is strange to me; and that is, that the Bible has grown so beautiful to me. It seems to me that it has been all my life like the transparent picture, without any light behind it; and now it is all illuminated, and its words are full of meaning to me. I am light-hearted and happy—happier than ever I was. Do you remember the first day you came to Canema, that I told you it seemed so sad that we must die? That feeling is all gone, now: I feel that Jesus is everywhere, and that there is no such thing as dying; it is only going out of one room into another.

'Everybody wonders to see how light-hearted I am; and poor aunty says "she trembles for me." I couldn't help thinking of that the other morning. I was reading to Tiff what Jesus said when they asked him why his disciples did not fast: "Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn while the bridegroom is with them?"

'Now, my dear friend, you must tell me what you think of all this, because, you know, I always tell you everything. I have written to Livy about it, because I know it will make her so happy. Milly seems to understand it all, and what she says to me really seems to help me very much. I always used to think that Milly had some strange, beautiful kind of inward life that I knew nothing of, because she would speak with so much certainty of God's love, and act as if it was so real to her; and she would tell me so earnestly, "Chile, he loves you!" Now I see into it—the mystery of his love to us, and how he overcomes and subdues all things by love; and I understand how perfect love casteth out fear.'

To this letter Nina soon received an answer, from which also we give an extract:—

'If I was so happy, my dearest one, as to be able to awaken that deeper and higher nature which I always knew was in you, I thank God. But if I ever was in any respect your teacher, you have passed beyond my teachings now. Your childlike simplicity of nature makes you a better scholar than I, in that school where the first step is to forget all our worldly wisdom, and become a little child. We men have much more to contend with, in the pride of our nature, and in our habits of worldly reasoning. It takes us long to learn the lesson that faith is the highest wisdom. Don't trouble your head, dear Nina, with aunt Nesbit or Mr. Titmarsh. What you feel is faith. They define it, and you feel it. And there's all the difference between the definition and the feeling that there is between the husk and the corn.

'As for me, I am less happy than you. Religion seems to me to have two parts to it. One part is the aspiration of man's nature, and the other is God's answer to those aspirations. I have, as yet, only the first; perhaps, because I am less simple and less true; perhaps, because I am not yet become a little child. So you must be my guide, instead of I yours, for I believe it is written of the faithful, that a little child shall lead them. I am a good deal tried now, my dear, because I am coming to a crisis in my life. I am going to take a step that will deprive me of many friends, of popularity, and that will, perhaps, alter all my course for the future. But, if I should lose friends and popularity, you would love me still, would you not? It is wronging you to ask such a question, but yet I should like to have your answer to it. It will make me stronger for what I have to do. On Thursday, of this week, my case will come on again. I am very busy just now; but the thought of you mingles with every thought.'

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE LEGAL DECISION.

THE time for the session of the Supreme Court had now arrived, and Clayton's cause was to be reconsidered. Judge Clayton felt exceedingly chagrined as the time drew near. Being himself the leading judge of the Supreme Court, the declaration of the bench would necessarily be made known through him. 'It is extremely painful to me,' he said to Mrs. Clayton, 'to have this case referred to me; for I shall be obliged to reverse the decision.'

'Well,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'Edward must have fortitude to encounter the usual reverses of his profession. He made a gallant defence, and received a great deal of admiration, which will not be at all lessened by this.'

'You do not understand me,' said Judge Clayton. 'It is not the coming out in opposition to Edward which principally annoys me. It is the nature of the decision that I am obliged to make—the doctrine that I feel myself forced to announce.'

'And must you then?' said Mrs. Clayton.

'Yes, I must,' said Judge Clayton. 'A judge can only perceive and declare. What I see, I must speak, though it go against all my feelings and all my sense of right.'

'I don't see, for my part,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'how that decision can possibly be reversed, without allowing the most monstrous injustice.'

'Such is the case,' said Judge Clayton; 'but I sit in my seat, not to make laws, nor to alter them, but simply to declare what they are. However bad the principle declared, it is not so bad as the proclamation of a falsehood would be. I have sworn truly to declare the laws, and I must keep my oath.'

'And have you talked with Edward about it?'

'Not particularly. He understands, in general, the manner in which the thing lies in my mind.'

This conversation took place just before it was time for Judge Clayton to go to his official duties. The court-room, on this occasion, was somewhat crowded. Barker, being an active, resolute, and popular man with a certain class, had talked up a considerable excitement with regard to his case. Clayton's friends were interested in it on his account. Lawyers were for the sake of the principle; so that, upon the whole, there was a good deal of attention drawn towards this decision. Among the spectators on the morning of the court, Clayton remarked Harry. For reasons which our readers may appreciate, his presence there was a matter of interest to Clayton. He made his way towards him.

'Harry,' he said, 'how came you here?'

'The ladies,' said Harry, 'thought they would like to know how the thing went, and so I got on my horse, and came over.'

As he spoke, he placed in Clayton's hand a note, and as the paper touched his hand, a close spectator might have seen the colour rise in his cheek. He made his way back to his place, and opened a law-book, which he held up before his face. Inside the law-book, however, there was a little sheet of gilt-edged paper, on which were written a few words in pencil, more interesting than all the law in the world. Shall we commit the treason of reading over his shoulder? It was as follows:—

‘ You say you may to-day be called to do something which you think right, but which will lose you many friends; which will destroy your popularity, which may alter all your prospects in life; and you ask if I can love you yet. I say, in answer, that it was not your friends that I loved, nor your popularity, nor your prospects, but you. I can love and honour a man who is not afraid nor ashamed to do what he thinks to be right; and, therefore, I hope ever to remain yours,

‘ NINA.

‘ P.S. I only got your letter this morning, and have but just time to scribble this and send by Harry. We are all well, and shall be glad to see you as soon as the case is over.’

‘ Clayton, my boy, you are very busy with your authorities,’ said Frank Russel, behind him. Clayton hastily hid the paper in his hand. ‘ It’s charming,’ said Russel, ‘ to have little manuscript annotations on law. It lights it up, like the illuminations in old missals. But, I say, Clayton, you live at the fountain-head;—how is the case going?’

‘ Against me!’ said Clayton.

‘ Well, it’s no great odds, after all. You have had your triumph; these after-thoughts cannot take away that. * * * * But, hush! there’s your father going to speak.’

Every eye in the court-room was turned upon Judge Clayton, who was standing with his usual self-poised composure of manner. In a clear, deliberate voice, he spoke as follows:—

‘ A judge cannot but lament, when such cases as the present are brought into judgment. It is impossible that the reasons on which they go can be appreciated, but where institutions similar to our own exist, and are thoroughly understood. The struggle, too, in the judge’s own breast, between the feelings of the man and the duty of the magistrate, is a severe one, presenting strong temptation to put aside such questions, if it be possible. It is useless, however, to complain of things inherent in our political state. And it is criminal in a court to avoid any responsibility which the laws impose. With whatever reluctance, therefore, it is done, the court is compelled to express an opinion upon the extent of the dominion of the master over the slave in North Carolina.

'The indictment charges a battery on Milly, a slave of Louisa Nesbit. * * * * The inquiry here is, whether a cruel and unreasonable battery on a slave by the hirer is indictable. The judge below instructed the jury that it is. He seems to have put it on the ground, that the defendant had but a special property. Our laws uniformly treat the master, or other person having the possession and command of the slave, as entitled to the same extent of authority. The object is the same; the service of the slave; and the same powers must be confided. In a criminal proceeding, and, indeed, in reference to all other persons but the general owner, the hirer and possessor of the slave, in relation to both rights and duties is, for the time being, the owner. * * * * But, upon the general question, whether the owner is answerable criminaliter, for a battery upon his own slave, or other exercise of authority or force, not forbidden by statute, the court entertains but little doubt. That he is so liable has never been decided, nor, as far as is known, been hitherto contended. There has been no prosecution of the sort. The established habits and uniform practice of the country, in this respect, is the best evidence of the portion of power deemed by the whole community requisite to the preservation of the master's dominion.

'If we thought differently, we could not set our notions in array against the judgment of everybody else, and say that this or that authority may be safely lopped off. This has indeed been assimilated at the bar to the other domestic relations; and arguments drawn from the well-established principles which confer and restrain the authority of the parent over the child, the tutor over the pupil, the master over the apprentice, have been pressed on us. The court does not recognise their application. There is no likeness between the cases. They are in opposition to each other, and there is an impassable gulf between them. The difference is that which exists between freedom and slavery; and a greater cannot be imagined. In the one, the end in view is the happiness of the youth born to equal rights with that governor on whom the duty devolves of training the young to usefulness, in a station which he is afterwards to assume among freemen. To such an end, and with such a subject, moral and intellectual instruction seem the natural means; and, for the most part, they are found to suffice. Moderate force is superadded only to make the others effectual. If that fail, it is better to leave the party to his own headstrong passions, and the ultimate correction of the law, than to allow it to be immoderately inflicted by a private person. With slavery it is far otherwise. The end is the profit of the master, his security, and the public safety; the subject, one doomed, in his own person and his posterity, to live without knowledge, and without the capacity to make anything his own, and to toil that another may reap the fruits.

What moral considerations shall be addressed to such a being, to convince him what it is impossible but that the most stupid must feel and know can never be true,—that he is thus to labour upon a principle of natural duty, or for the sake of his own personal happiness? Such services can only be expected from one who has no will of his own; who surrenders his will in implicit obedience to that of another. Such obedience is the consequence only of uncontrolled authority over the body. There is nothing else which can operate to produce the effect. THE POWER OF THE MASTER MUST BE ABSOLUTE, TO RENDER THE SUBMISSION OF THE SLAVE PERFECT. I most freely confess my sense of the harshness of this proposition. I feel it as deeply as any man can; and, as a principle of moral right, every person in his retirement must repudiate it. But, in the actual condition of things, it must be so. There is no remedy. This discipline belongs to the state of slavery. They cannot be disunited without abrogating at once the rights of the master, and absolving the slave from his subjection. It constitutes the curse of slavery to both the bond and the free portions of our population. But it is inherent in the relation of master and slave. That there may be particular instances of cruelty and deliberate barbarity, where in conscience the law might properly interfere, is most probable. The difficulty is to determine where a court may properly begin. Merely in the abstract, it may well be asked which power of the master accords with right. The answer will probably sweep away all of them. But we cannot look at the matter in that light. The truth is, that we are forbidden to enter upon a train of general reasoning on the subject. We cannot allow the right of the master to be brought into discussion in the courts of justice. The slave, to remain a slave, must be made sensible that there is no appeal from his master; that his power is in no instance usurped, but is conferred by the laws of man, at least, if not by the law of God. The danger would be great, indeed, if the tribunals of justice should be called on to graduate the punishment appropriate to every temper, and every dereliction of menial duty.

'No man can anticipate the many and aggravated provocations of the master, which the slave would be constantly stimulated by his own passions, or the instigation of others, to give; or the consequent wrath of the master, prompting him to bloody vengeance upon the turbulent traitor; a vengeance generally practised with impunity, by reason of its privacy. The court, therefore, disclaims the power of changing the relation in which these parts of our people stand to each other.

'I repeat, that I would gladly have avoided this ungrateful question; but, being brought to it, the court is compelled to declare that while slavery exists amongst us in its present state, or until it shall seem fit to the legislature to interpose express enactments to the contrary, it will be the imperative duty of the judges to recognize the full dominion of the owner over the slave, except where the exercise of it is forbidden by statute. And this we do upon the ground that this dominion is essential to the value of slaves as property, to the security of the master and the public tranquillity, greatly dependent upon their subordination, and, in fine, as most effectually securing the general protection and comfort of the slaves themselves. "Judgment below reversed; and judgment entered for the defendant." *'

During the delivery of the decision Clayton's eyes, by accident, became fixed upon Harry, who was standing opposite to him, and who listened through the whole with breathless attention. He observed, as it went on, that his face became pale, his brow clouded, and that a fierce and peculiar expression flashed from his dark-blue eye. Never had Clayton so forcibly realized the horrors of slavery, as when he heard them thus so calmly defined in the presence of one into whose soul the iron had entered. The tones of Judge Clayton's voice, so passionless, clear, and deliberate; the solemn, calm, unflinching earnestness of his words were more than a thousand passionate appeals. In the dead silence that followed, Clayton rose, and requested permission of the court to be allowed to say a few words in view of the decision.

His father looked slightly surprised, and there was a little movement among the judges. But curiosity, perhaps, among other reasons, led the court to give consent.

Clayton spoke: 'I hope it will not be considered a disrespect or impertinence for me to say that the law of slavery, and the nature of that institution, have for the first time been made known to me to-day in their true character. I had before flattered myself with the hope that it might be considered a guardian institution, by which a stronger race might assume the care and instruction of the weaker one; and I had hoped that its laws were capable of being so administered as to protect the defenceless. This illusion is destroyed. I see but too clearly now the purpose and object of the law. I cannot, therefore, as a Christian man, remain in the practice of law in a slave state. I therefore relinquish the profession, into which I have just been inducted, and retire for ever from the bar of my native state.'

'There! there! there he goes!' said Frank Russel. 'The sticking-point has come at last; his conscience is up, and start him now who can!'

There was a slight motion of surprise in the court and audience. But Judge Clayton sat with unmoved serenity. The words had struck to the depth of his soul. They had struck at the root of one of his strongest hopes in life. But he had listened to them with the same calm and punctilious attention which it was his habit to give to every speaker; and, with unaltered composure, he proceeded to the next business of the court. A step so unusual occasioned no little excitement. But Clayton was not one of the class of people to whom his associates generally felt at liberty to express their opinions of his conduct. The quiet reserve of his manners discouraged any such freedom. As usual, in cases where a person takes an uncommon course from conscientious motives, Clayton was severely criticised. The more trifling among the audience contented themselves with using the good set phrases—quixotic, absurd, ridiculous. The elder lawyers, and those friendly to Clayton, shook their heads, and said—rash, precipitate, unadvised.

'There's a want of ballast about him, somewhere!' said one.

'He is unsound!' said another.

'Radical and impracticable!' added a third.

'Yes,' said Frank Russel, who had just come up, 'Clayton is as radical and impracticable as the sermon on the mount, and that's the most impracticable thing I know of in literature. We all can serve God and mammon. We have discovered that happy medium in our day. Clayton is behind the times: he's Jewish in his notions. Don't you think so Mr. Titmarsh?' addressing the Rev. Mr. Titmarsh.

'It strikes me that our young friend is extremely ultra,' said Mr. Titmarsh. 'I might feel disposed to sympathise with him in the feelings he expressed, to some extent; but it having pleased the Divine Providence to establish the institution of slavery, I humbly presume it is not competent for human reason to judge of it.'

'And if it had pleased the Divine Providence to have established the institution of piracy, you'd say the same thing, I suppose?' said Frank Russel.

'Certainly, my young friend,' said Mr. Titmarsh. 'Whatever is divinely ordered becomes right by that fact.'

'I should think,' said Frank Russel, 'that things were divinely ordered because they are right.'

'No, my friend,' replied Mr. Titmarsh, moderately, 'they are right because they are ordered, however contrary they may appear to any of our poor notions of justice and humanity.'

And Mr. Titmarsh walked off.

'Did you hear that?' said Russel, 'And they expect really to come it over us with stuff like that! Now, if a fellow don't go to church Sundays, there's a dreadful outcry against him for not being religious! And if they get us there, that's just the kind of thing they put down our throats! As if they were going to make practical men give in to such humbugs!'

And the Rev. Mr. Titmarsh went off in another direction, lamenting to a friend as follows:

'How mournfully infidelity is increasing among the young men of our day! They quote Scripture with the same freedom that they would a book of plays, and seem to treat it with no more reverence! I believe it's the want of catechetical instruction while they are children. There's been a great falling back in the teaching of the Assembly's Catechism to children when they are young! I shall get that point up at the General Assembly. If that were thoroughly committed when they are children, I think they would never doubt afterwards.'

Clayton went home and told his mother what he had done, and why. His father had not spoken to him on this subject; and there was that about Judge Clayton which made it difficult to introduce a topic, unless he signified an inclination to enter upon it. He was, as usual, calm, grave, and considerate, attending to every duty with unwearying regularity. At the end of the second day, in the evening, Judge Clayton requested his son to walk into his study. The interview was painful on both sides.

'You are aware, my son,' he said, 'that the step you have taken is a very painful one to me. I hope that it was not taken precipitately, from any sudden impulse.'

'You may rest assured it was not,' said Clayton. 'I followed the deepest and most deliberate convictions of my conscience.'

'In that case, you could not do otherwise,' replied Judge Clayton. 'I have no criticisms to make. But will your conscience allow you to retain the position of a slave-holder?'

'I have already relinquished it,' replied Clayton, 'so far as my own intentions are concerned. I retain the legal relation of owner simply as a means of protecting my servants from the cruelties of the law, and of securing the opportunity to educate and elevate them.'

'And suppose this course brings you into conflict with the law of the state?' said Judge Clayton.

'If there is any reasonable prospect of having the law altered, I must endeavour to do that,' said Clayton.

'But!' said Judge Clayton, 'suppose the law is so rooted in the nature of the institution that it cannot be repealed without uprooting the institution? What then?'

'I say repeal the law, if it do uproot the institution,' said Clayton. 'Fiat justitia ruat cælum.'

'I supposed that would be your answer,' said Judge Clayton, patiently. 'That is undoubtedly the logical line of life. But you are aware that communities do not follow such lines; your course, therefore, will place you in opposition to the community in which you live. Your conscientious convictions will cross self-interest, and the community will not allow you to carry them out.'

'Then,' said Clayton, 'I must, with myself and my servants, remove to some region where I can do this.'

'That I supposed would be the result,' said Judge Clayton. 'And have you looked at the thing in all its relations and consequences?'

'I have,' said Clayton.

'You are about to form a connection with Miss Gordon,' said Judge Clayton. 'Have you considered how this will affect her?'

'Yes,' said Clayton. 'Miss Gordon fully sustains me in the course I have taken.'

'I have no more to say,' said Judge Clayton. 'Every man must act up to his sense of duty.'

There was a pause of a few moments, and Judge Clayton added :

‘ You, perhaps, have seen the implication which your course throws upon us who still continue to practise the system and uphold the institution which you repudiate?’

‘ I meant no implications,’ said Clayton.

‘ I presume not. But they result logically from your course,’ said his father. ‘ I assure you, I have often myself pondered the question with reference to my own duties. My course is a sufficient evidence that I have not come to the same result. Human law is, at best, but an approximation, a reflection of many of the ills of our nature. Imperfect as it is, it is, on the whole, a blessing. The worst system is better than anarchy.’

‘ But, my father, why could you not have been a reformer of the system?’

‘ My son, no reform is possible, unless we are prepared to give up the institution of slavery. That will be the immediate result; and this is so realised by the instinct of self-preservation, which is unfailing in its accuracy, that every such proposition will be ignored, till there is a settled conviction in the community that the institution itself is a moral evil, and a sincere determination felt to be free from it. I see no tendency of things in that direction. That body of religious men of different denominations, called, par excellence, the Church, exhibit a degree of moral apathy on this subject which is to me very surprising. It is with them that the training of the community, on which any such reform could be built, must commence, and I see no symptoms of their undertaking it. The decisions and testimonies of the great religious assemblies in the land, in my youth, were frequent. They have grown every year less and less decided; and now the morality of the thing is openly defended in our pulpits, to my great disgust. I see no way but that the institution will be left to work itself out to its final result, which will, in the end, be ruinous to our country. I am not myself gifted with the talents of a reformer. My turn of mind fits me for the situation I hold. I cannot hope that I have done no harm in it; but the good, I hope, will outweigh the evil. If you feel a call to enter on this course, fully understanding the difficulties and sacrifices it would probably involve, I would be the last one to throw the influence of my private wishes and feelings into the scale. We live here but a few years. It is of more consequence that we should do right, than that we should enjoy ourselves.’

Judge Clayton spoke this with more émotion than he usually exhibited, and Clayton was much touched.

'My dear father,' he said, putting Nina's note into his hand, 'you made allusion to Miss Gordon. This note, which I received from her on the morning of your decision, will show you what her spirit is.'

Judge Clayton put on his spectacles, and read over the note, deliberately, twice. He then handed it formally to his son, and remarked, with his usual brevity, 'She will do!'

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE CLOUD BURSTS.

THE shadow of that awful cloud which had desolated other places now began to darken the boundaries of the plantation of Canema. No disease has ever more fully filled out the meaning of those awful words of Scripture, 'the pestilence that walketh in darkness.' None has been more irregular, and apparently more perfectly capricious in its movements. During the successive seasons that it has been epidemic in this country, it has seemed to set at defiance the skill of the physicians. The system of medical tactics which has been wrought out by the painful experience of one season seems to be laughed to scorn by the varying type of the disease in the next. Certain sanitary laws and conditions would seem to be indispensable; yet those who are familiar with it have had fearful experience how, like a wolf, it will sometimes leap the boundaries of the best and most carefully-guarded fold, and, spite of every caution and protection, sweep all before it. Its course through towns and villages has been equally singular; sometimes, descending like a cloud on a neighbourhood, it will leave a single village or town untouched amidst the surrounding desolations, and long after, when health is restored to the whole neighbourhood, come down suddenly on the omitted towns, as a ravaging army sends back a party for prey to some place which has been overlooked or forgotten. Sometimes entering a house, in twenty-four hours it will take all who are in it. Sometimes it will ravage all the city, except some one street or locality, and then come upon that, while all else is spared. Its course upon southern plantations was marked by similar capriciousness, and was made still more fatal by that peculiar nature of plantation-life which withdraws the inmates so far from medical aid. When the first letters were received, describing the progress of it in the northern cities, aunt

Nesbit felt much uneasiness and alarm. It is remarkable with what tenacity people will cling to life, whose enjoyments in it are so dull and low, that a bystander would scarcely think them worth the struggle of preservation. When at length the dreaded news began to be heard from one point and another in their vicinity, aunt Nesbit said, one day, to Nina,—

‘Your cousins, the Gordons in E——, have written to us to leave the plantation, and come and spend some time with them, till the danger is over.’

‘Why?’ said Nina; ‘do they think the cholera can’t come there?’

‘Well,’ said aunt Nesbit, ‘they have their family under most excellent regulations; and, living in a town so, they are within call of a doctor, if anything happens.’

‘Aunt,’ said Nina, ‘perhaps you had better go; but I will stay with my people.’

‘Why, don’t you feel afraid, Nina?’

‘No, aunt, I don’t. Besides, I think it would be very selfish for me to live on the services of my people all my life, and then run away and leave them alone when a time of danger comes. The least I can do is to stay and take care of them.’

This conversation was overheard by Harry, who was standing with his back to them, on the veranda, near the parlor door where they were sitting.

‘Child,’ said aunt Nesbit, ‘what do you suppose you can do? you haven’t any experience. Harry and Milly can do a great deal better than you can. I’ll leave Milly here. It’s our first duty to take care of our health.’

‘No, aunt, I think there are some duties before that,’ said Nina. ‘It’s true, I haven’t a great deal of strength, but I have courage; and I know my going away would discourage our people and fill them with fear; and that, they say, predisposes to the disease. I shall get the carriage up, and go directly over to see the doctor, and get directions and medicines. I shall talk to our people, and teach them what to do, and see that it is done. And when they see that I am calm, and not afraid, they will have courage. But, aunt, if you are afraid, I think you had better go. You are feeble; you can’t make much exertion; and if you feel any safer or more comfortable, I think it would be best. I should like to have Milly stay; and she, Harry, and I will be a board or health to the plantation. Harry,’ she said, ‘if you’ll get up the carriage, we’ll go immediately.’

Again Harry felt the bitterness of his soul sweetened and tranquillised by the noble nature of her to whose hands the law had given the chain which bound him. Galling and intolerable as it would have been otherwise, he felt, when with her, that her service was perfect freedom. He had not said anything to Nina about the contents of the letter which he had received from his sister. He saw that it was an evil which she had no power over, and he shrank from annoying her with it. Nina supposed that his clouded and troubled aspect was caused wholly by the solicitude of responsibility. In the same carriage which conveyed her to the town sat aunt Nesbit also, and her cap-boxes, whose importance even the fear of the cholera could not lessen in her eyes. Nina found the physician quite au fait on the subject. He had been reading about miasma and animalculæ, and he entertained Nina nearly half an hour with different theories as to the cause of the disease, and with the experiments which had been made in foreign hospitals. Among the various theories, there was one which appeared to be his particular pet; and Nina could not help thinking, as he stepped about so alertly, that he almost enjoyed the prospect of putting his discoveries to the test. By dint, however, of very practical and positive questions, Nina drew from him all the valuable information which he had to give her; and he wrote her a very full system of directions, and put up a case of medicines for her, assuring her that he should be happy to attend in person, if he had time.

On the way home, Nina stopped at uncle John Gordon's plantation, and there had the first experience of the difference between written directions for a supposed case, and the actual, awful realities of the disease. Her uncle John had been seized only half an hour before in the most awful manner. The household was all in terror and confusion, and the shrieks and groans of agony which proceeded from his room were appalling. His wife, busy with the sufferer, did not perceive that the messengers who had been sent in haste for the doctor were wringing their hands in fruitless terror, running up and down the veranda, and doing nothing.

'Harry,' said Nina, 'take out one of the carriage-horses, and ride quick for your life, and bring the doctor over here in a minute.'

In a few moments the thing was done, and Harry was out of sight. She then walked up to the distracted servants, and commanded them, in a tone of authority, to cease their lamentations. Her resolute manner, and the quiet tone of voice which she preserved, acted as a sedative on their excited nerves. She banished all but two or three of the most reasonable from the house, and then went to the assistance of her aunt.

Before long the doctor arrived. When he had been in the sick-room a few moments he came out to make some inquiries of Nina, and she could not help contrasting the appalled and confounded expression of his countenance with the dapper, consequential air, with which, only two hours before, he had been holding forth to her on animalculæ and miasma.

'The disease,' he said, 'presented itself in an entirely different aspect from what he had expected. The remedies,' he said, 'did not work as he anticipated: the case was a peculiar one.'

Alas! before three months were over, poor doctor, you found many peculiar cases.

'Do you think you can save his life?' said Nina.

'Child, only God can save him,' said the physician; 'nothing works right.'

But why prolong the torture of that scene, or rehearse the struggles, groans, and convulsions? Nina, poor flowery girl of seventeen summers, stood with the rest in mute despair. All was tried that could be done or thought of, but the disease, like some blind, deaf destroyer, marched on, turning neither to right nor left, till the cries and groans grew fainter, the convulsed muscles relaxed, and the strong, florid man lay in the last stages of that fearful collapse, which in one hour shrivels the most healthy countenance and the firmest muscles to the shrunken and withered image of decrepit old age.

When the breath had passed and all was over, Nina could scarcely believe that that altered face and form, so withered and so worn, could have been her healthy and joyous uncle, and who never had appeared healthier or more joyous than on that morning. But, as a person passing under the foam and spray of Niagara clings with blind confidence to a guide whom he feels but cannot see, Nina, in this awful hour, felt that she was not alone. The Redeemer, all-powerful over death and the grave, of whom she had been thinking so much of late, seemed to her sensibly near; and it seemed to her as if a voice said to her continually, 'Fear not, for I am with thee. Be not dismayed, for I am thy God.'

'How calm you are, my child,' said aunt Maria to her. 'I wouldn't have thought it was in you. I don't know what we should do without you.'

But now a frightful wail was heard.—'Oh, we are all dying!

We are all going! Oh, missis! come quick. Peter has got it! Oh, daddy has got it! Oh, my chile! my chile!

And the doctor, exhausted as he was by the surprise and excitement of this case, began flying from one to another of the cabins in the greatest haste. Two or three of the house-servants also seemed to be struck in the same moment, and only the calmness and courage which Nina and her aunt maintained prevented a general abandonment to panic. Nina possessed that fine, elastic temperament which, with the appearance of extreme delicacy, possesses great powers of endurance. The perfect calmness which she felt enabled her to bring all her faculties to bear on the emergency.

'My good aunty, you mustn't be afraid. Bring out your religion; trust in God,' said she to the cook, who was wringing her hands in terror. 'Remember your religion; sing some of your hymns, and do your duty to the sick.'

There is a magic power in the cheerful tone of courage, and Nina succeeded in rallying those who were well to take care of the sick; but now came a messenger in hot haste to say that the cholera had broken out on the plantation at home.

'Well, Harry,' said Nina, with a face pale, yet unmoved, 'our duty calls us away.' And, accompanied by the weary physician, they prepared to go back to Canema.

Before they had proceeded far, a man met them on horseback. 'Is Doctor Butler with you?'

'Yes,' said Nina, putting her head out of the carriage.

'Oh, doctor! I've been riding all over the country after you. You must come back to town this minute. Judge Peters is dying. I'm afraid he is dead before this time, and there's a dozen more cases right in that street. Here, get on my horse and ride for your life.'

The doctor hastily sprang from the carriage and mounted the horse; then, stopping a moment, he cast a look of good-natured pity on the sweet, pale face that was leaning out of the carriage-window.

'My poor child,' he said, 'I can't bear to leave you: who will help you?'

'God!' said Nina; 'I am not afraid.'

'Come, come,' said the man; 'do hurry.' And with one hasty glance more he was gone.

'Now, Harry,' said Nina, 'everything depends upon our keeping up our courage and our strength. We shall have no physician: we must just do the best we can. After all it is our Lord Jesus that has the keys of death, and he loved us, and died for us. He will certainly be with us.'

'Oh, Miss Nina! you are an angel,' said Harry, who felt at that moment as if he could have worshipped her.

Arrived at home, Nina found a scene of terror and confusion similar to that she had already witnessed. Old Hundred lay dead in his cabin, and the lamenting crowd, gathering round, were yielding to the full tide of fear and excitement which predisposed them to the same fate. Nina rode up immediately to the group. She spoke to them calmly; she silenced their outcries and bade them obey her.

'If you wish, all of you, to die,' she said, 'this is the way towards it; but if you'll keep quiet and calm, and do what ought to be done, your lives may be saved. Harry and I have got medicines;—we understand what to do. You must follow our directions exactly.'

Nina immediately went to the house and instructed Milly, aunt Rose, and two or three of the elderly women in the duties to be done. Milly rose up in this hour of terror with all the fortitude inspired by her strong nature.

'Bress de Lord,' she said, 'for his grace to you, chile. De Lord is a shield. He's been wid us in six troubles, and he'll be wid us in seven. We can sing in de swellings of Jordan.'

Harry, meanwhile, was associating to himself a band of the most reliable men on the place, and endeavouring in the same manner to organize them for action. A messenger was despatched immediately to the neighbouring town for unlimited quantities of the most necessary medicines and stimulants. The plantation was districted off, and placed under the care of leaders who held communication with Harry. In the course of two or three hours the appalling scene of distress and confusion was reduced to the resolute and orderly condition of a well-managed hospital. Milly walked the rounds in every direction, appealing to the religious sensibilities of the people, and singing hymns of trust and confidence. She possessed a peculiar voice, suited to her large development of physical frame, almost as deep as a man's bass, with the rich softness of a feminine tone, and Nina could now and then distinguish, as she was moving about the house or grounds, that triumphant tone, singing, .

' God is my sun,
 And he my shade,
 To guard my head,
 By night or noon.
 Hast thou not given thy word
 To save my soul from death?
 And I can trust my Lord,
 To keep my mortal breath.
 P'll go and come,
 Nor fear to die,
 'Till from on high
 Thou call me home.'

The house that night presented an aspect of a beleaguered garrison. Nina and Milly had thrown open all the chambers; and such as were peculiarly exposed to the disease, by delicacy of organization or tremulousness of nervous system, were allowed to take shelter there.

' Now, chile,' said Milly, when all the arrangements had been made, ' you jes lie down and go to sleep in yer own room. I see how 'tis with you; de spirit is willing, but de flesh is weak. Chile, dere isn't much of you, but dere won't nothing go without you. So, you take care of yerself first. Neber you be 'fraid! De people's quiet now, and de sick ones is bein' took care of, and de folks is all doing de best dey can. So, now, you try and get some sleep; 'cause if you goes we shall all go.'

Accordingly, Nina retired to her room, but before she lay down, she wrote to Clayton:—

' We are all in affliction here, my dear friend. Poor uncle John died this morning of the cholera. I had been to E—— to see a doctor and provide medicines. When I came back I thought I would call a few moments at the house, and I found a perfect scene of horror. Poor uncle died, and there are a great many sick on the place now, and while I was thinking that I would stay and help aunt, a messenger came in all haste, saying that the disease had broken out on our place at home.

' We were bringing the doctor with us in our carriage, when we met a man riding full speed from E——, who told us that Judge Peters was dying, and a great many others were sick in the same street. When we came home, we found the poor old coachman dead, and the people in the greatest consternation. It took us some time to tranquillize them and to produce order; but that is now done. Our house is full of the sick and the fearful ones. Milly and Harry are firm and active, and inspire the rest with courage. About twenty are taken with the disease, but not as yet in a violent way. In this awful hour, I feel a strange peace, which the Bible truly says "passeth all understanding." I see, now, that though the world and all that is in it should perish, "Christ can give us a beautiful immortal life." I write to you, because, perhaps, this may be the only opportunity. If I die, do not mourn for me, but thank God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. But, then, I trust, I shall not die. I hope to live in this world, which is more than ever beautiful to me. Life has never been so valuable and dear as since I have known you. Yet I have such trust in the love of my Redeemer, that if he were to ask me to lay it down, I could do it almost without a sigh. I would follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. Perhaps the same dreadful evil is around you,—perhaps at Magnolia Grove. I will not be selfish in calling you here, if Anne needs you more. Perhaps she has no such reliable help as Harry and Milly are to me. So do not fear, and do not leave any duty for me. Our Father loves us, and will do nothing amiss. Milly walks about the entries singing. I love to hear her sing, she sings in such a grand, triumphant tone. Hark, I hear her now!

‘I’ll go and come,
Nor fear to die,
Till from on high
Thou call me home.’

‘I shall write you every mail now, till we are better, ‘Living or dying, ever your own,
‘NINA.’

After writing this, Nina lay down and slept—slept all night as quietly as if death and disease were not hanging overhead. In the morning she rose and dressed herself, and Milly, with anxious care, brought to her room some warm coffee and crackers, which she insisted on her taking before she left her apartment.

‘How are they all, Milly?’ said Nina.

‘Well, chile,’ said Milly, ‘de midnight cry has been heard among us. Aunt Rose is gone; and big Sam and Jack, and Sally, dey’s all gone; but de people is all more quiet, love, and dey’s determined to stand it out!’

‘How is Harry?’ said Nina, in a tremulous voice.

‘He isn’t sick; he has been up all night working over the sick, but he keeps up good heart. De older ones is going to have a little prayer-meeting after breakfast, as a sort of funeral to dem dat's dead; and, perhaps, Miss Nina, you'd read us a chapter.'

'Certainly I will,' said Nina.

It was yet an early hour, when a large circle of family and plantation hands gathered together in the pleasant open saloon, which we have so often described. The day was a beautiful one; the leaves and shrubbery round the veranda moist and tremulous with the glittering freshness of morning dew. There was a murmur of tenderness and admiration as Nina, in a white morning-wrapper, and a cheek as white, came into the room.

'Sit down, all my friends,' she said, 'sit down,' looking at some of the plantation-men, who seemed to be diffident about taking the sofa which was behind them; 'it's no time for ceremony now, we are standing on the brink of the grave, where all are equal. I'm glad to see you so calm and so brave. I hope your trust is in the Saviour, who gives us the victory over death. Sing,' she said. Milly began the well-known hymn:—

'And must this feeble body fail,
And must it faint and die?
My soul shall quit this gloomy vale,
And soar to realms on high;

'Shall join the disembodied saints,
And find its long-sought rest;
That only rest for which it pants
On the Redeemer's breast.'

Every voice joined, and the words rose triumphant from the very gates of the grave. When the singing was over, Nina, in a tremulous voice, which grew clearer as she went on, read the undaunted words of the ancient psalm:—

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress.

"My God, in Him will I trust. Surely He shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers. Under His wings shalt thou trust.

"Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.

"A thousand shall fall by thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee, He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways."

'It is possible,' said Nina, 'that we may, some of us, be called away. But to those that love Christ there is no fear in death. It is only going home to our Father. Keep up courage then!'

In all cases like this the first shock brings with it more terror than any which succeed. The mind can become familiar with anything, even with the prospect of danger and death, so that it can appear to be an ordinary condition of existence. Everything proceeded calmly on the plantation; and all, stimulated by the example of their young mistress, seemed determined to meet the exigency firmly and faithfully.

In the afternoon of the second day, as Nina was sitting in the door, she observed the wagon of uncle Tiff making its way up the avenue, and with her usual impulsiveness, ran down to meet her humble friend.

'O, Tiff, how do you do in these dreadful times?'

'O, Miss Nina,' said the faithful creature, removing his hat with habitual politeness, 'if you please, I's brought 'de baby here, 'cause it's drefful sick, and I's been doing all I could for him, and he don't get no better. And I's brought Miss Fanny and Teddy, 'cause I's 'fraid to leave 'em, 'cause I see a man yesterday, and he tell me dey was dying eberywhar on all de places round.'

'Well,' said Nina, 'you have come to a sorrowful 'place, for they are dying here, too! But if you feel any safer here, you and the children may stay; and we'll do for you just as we do for each other. Give me the baby, while you get out. It's asleep, isn't it?'

'Yes, Miss Nina, it's 'sleep pretty much all de time, now.'

Nina carried it up the steps, and put it into the arms of Milly.

'It's sleeping nicely,' she said.

'Ah, honey!' said Milly, 'it 'll neber wake up out of dat ar! Dat ar sleep an't de good kind!'

'Well,' said Nina, 'we'll help him take care of it, and we'll make room for him and the children, Milly; because we have medicines and directions, and they have nothing out there.'

So Tiff and his family took shelter in the general fortress.

Towards evening the baby died. Tiff held it in his arms to the very last, and it was with difficulty that Nina and Milly could persuade him that the little flickering breath was gone for ever. When forced to admit it, he seemed for a few moments perfectly inconsolable. Nina quietly opened her Testament, and read to him: 'And they brought little children unto him, that he should touch them; and his disciples rebuked those that brought them. But Jesus said, Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

'Bressed Lord!' said Tiff, 'I'll gib him up, I will! I won't hold out no longer! I won't forbid him to go, if it does break my old heart! Jaws, we's dresful selfish. But de poor little ting, he was getting so pretty!'

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE VOICE IN THE WILDERNESS.

CLAYTON was quietly sitting in his law-office, looking over and arranging some papers necessary to closing his business. A coloured boy brought in letters from the mail. He looked them over rapidly, and selecting one, read it with great agitation and impatience. Immediately he started, with the open letter crushed in his hand, seized his hat, and rushed to the nearest livery-stable.

'Give me the fastest horse you have—one that can travel night and day!' he said. 'I must ride for life or death!'

And half-an-hour more saw Clayton in full speed on the road. By the slow, uncertain, and ill-managed mail route it would have taken three days to reach Canema. Clayton hoped by straining every nerve to reach there in twenty-four hours. He pushed forward, keeping the animal at the top of his speed, and, at the first stage-stand, changed him for a fresh one. And thus, proceeding along, he found himself, at three o'clock of the next morning, in the woods about fifteen miles from Canema. The strong tension of the nervous system, which had upheld him insensible to fatigue up to this point, was beginning slightly to subside. All night he had ridden through the loneliness of pine forests, with no eye looking down on him save the twinkling mysterious stars. At the last place where he had sought to obtain horses, everything had been horror and confusion. Three people were lying dead in the house, and another was dying. All along upon the route, at every stopping-place, the air had seemed to be filled with flying rumours and exaggerated reports of fear and death. As soon as he began to perceive that he was approaching the plantation, he became sensible of that shuddering dread which all of us may remember to have had, in slight degrees, in returning home after a long absence under a vague expectation of misfortune, to which the mind can set no definite limits. When it was yet scarcely light enough to see, he passed by the cottage of old Tiff. A strange impulse prompted him to stop and make some inquiries there, before he pushed on to the plantation. But, as he rode up, he saw the gate standing ajar, the door of the house left open; and, after repeated callings, receiving no answer, he alighted, and leading his horse behind him, looked into the door. The gleaming star-light was just sufficient to show him that all was desolate. Somehow this seemed to him like an evil omen. As he was mounting his horse, preparing to ride away, a grand and powerful voice rose from the obscurity of the woods before him, singing, in a majestic minor-keyed tune, these words:—

‘Throned on a cloud our God shall come,
Bright flames prepare his way;
Thunder and darkness, fire and storm,
Lead on the dreadful day!’

Wearied with his night ride, his nervous system strained to the last point of tension by the fearful images which filled his mind, it is not surprising that these sounds should have thrilled through their hearer with even a superstitious power. And Clayton felt a singular excitement as, under the dim arcade of the pine-trees, he saw a dark figure approaching. He seemed to be marching with a regular tread, keeping time to the mournful music which he sang?

‘Who are you?’ called Clayton, making an effort to recall his manhood.

‘I?’ replied the figure, ‘I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. I am a sign unto this people of the judgment of the Lord!’

Our readers must remember the strange dimness of the hour, the wildness of the place and circumstances, and the singular quality of the tone in which the figure spoke. Clayton hesitated a moment, and the speaker went on:

‘I saw the Lord coming with ten thousand of his saints! Before him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at his feet! Thy bow is made quite naked, O God, according to the oaths of the tribes ! I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction, and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble !'

Pondering in his mind what this wild style of address might mean, Clayton rode slowly onward. And the man, for such he appeared to be, came out of the shadows of the wood and stood directly in his path, raising his hand with a commanding gesture.

'I know whom you seek,' he said ; 'but it shall not be given you ; for the star, which is called Wormwood, hath fallen, and the time of the dead is come, that they shall be judged. Behold, there sitteth on the white cloud one like the Son of Man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle !'

Then, waving his hand above his head, with a gesture of wild excitement, he shouted,

'Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth, for her grapes are fully ripe. Behold, the winepress shall be trodden without the city, and there shall be blood even to the horses' bridles ! Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabitants of the earth, because of the trumpets of the other angels which are yet to sound !'

The fearful words pealed through the dim aisles of the forest, like the curse of some destroying angel. After a pause, the speaker resumed, in a lower and more plaintive tone :

'Weep ye not for the dead, neither bewail her ! Behold, the Lamb standeth on Mount Zion, and with him a hundred and forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written on their foreheads. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth ; and in their mouth is found no guile, for they are without fault before the throne of God. Behold, the angel having the seal of God is gone forth, and she shall be sealed in her forehead unto the Lamb !'

The figure turned away slowly, singing, as he made his way through the forest, in the same weird and funereal accents ; but this time the song was a wild, plaintive sound, like the tolling of a heavy bell :

' Ding dong ! dead and gone !
Farewell, father !
Bury me in Egypt's land,
By my dear mother !
Ding, dong ! ding dong !
Dead and gone !'

Clayton, as he slowly wound his way along the unfrequented path, felt a dim, brooding sense of mystery and terror creeping over him. The tones of the voice, and the wild style of the speaker, recalled the strange incident of the camp-meeting; and though he endeavoured strenuously to reason with himself that probably some wild and excited fanatic, made still more frantic by the presence of death and destruction all around, was the author of these fearful denunciations, still he could not help a certain weight of fearful foreboding. This life may be truly called a haunted house, built as it is on the very confines of the land of darkness and the shadow of death. A thousand living fibres connect us with the unknown and unseen state; and the strongest hearts, which never stand still for any mortal terror, have sometimes hushed their very beating at the breath of a whisper from within the veil. Perhaps the most resolute unbeliever in spiritual things has hours of which he would be ashamed to tell, when he, too, yields to the powers of those awful affinities which bind us to that unknown realm. It is not surprising that Clayton, in spite of himself, should have felt like one mysteriously warned. It was a relief to him when the dusky dimness of the solemn dawn was pierced by long shafts of light from the rising sun, and the day broke gladsome and jubilant, as if sorrow, sighing, and death were a dream of the night. During the whole prevalence of this fearful curse, it was strange to witness the unaltered regularity, splendour, and beauty, with which the movements of the natural world went on. Amid fears, and dying groans, and wailings, and sobs, and broken hearts, the sun rose and set in splendour, the dews twinkled, and twilight folded her purple veil heavy with stars; birds sang, waters danced and warbled, flowers bloomed, and everything in nature was abundant, and festive, and joyous. When Clayton entered the boundaries of the plantation, he inquired eagerly of the first person he met for the health of its mistress. 'Thank God, she is yet alive!' said he. 'It was but a dream, after all!'

CHAPTER XXXVI. |

THE EVENING STAR.

THE mails in the state of North Carolina, like the prudential arrangements in the slave states generally, were very little to be depended upon; and therefore a week had elapsed after the mailing of Nina's first letter, describing the danger of her condition, before it was received by Clayton. During that time the fury of the shock which had struck the plantation appeared to have abated; and while on some estates in the vicinity it was yet on the increase, the inhabitants of Canema began to hope that the awful cloud was departing from them. It was true that many were still ailing; but there were no new cases, and the disease, in the case of those who were ill, appeared to be yielding to nursing and remedies. Nina had risen early in the morning, as her custom had been since the sickness, and gone the rounds to inquire for the health of her people. Returned, a little fatigued, she was sitting in the veranda, under the shadow of one of the pillar-roses, enjoying the cool freshness of the morning. Suddenly the tramp of a horse's feet was heard, and looking, she saw Clayton coming up the avenue. There seemed but a dizzy, confused moment, before his horse's bridle was thrown to the winds, and he was up the steps, holding her in his arms.

'O, you are here yet, my rose, my bride, my lamb! God is merciful! This is too much! O, I thought you were gone!'

'No, dear, not yet,' said Nina. 'God has been with us. We have lost a great many; but God has spared me to you.'

Are you really well?' said Clayton, holding her off, and looking at her. 'You look pale, my little rose!'

'That's not wonderful,' said Nina; 'I've had a great deal to make me look pale; but I am very well. I have been well through it all—never in better health—and, it seems strange to say it, but never happier. I have felt so peaceful, so sure of God's love.'

'Do you know,' said Clayton, 'that that peace alarms me—that strange, unearthly happiness? It seems so like what is given to dying people.'

'No,' said Nina; 'I think that when we have no one but our Father to lean on, he comes nearer than he does any other time; and that is the secret of this happiness. But come,—you look wofully-tired; have you been riding all night?'

'Yes, ever since yesterday morning at nine o'clock. I have ridden down four horses to get to you. Only think, I didn't get your letter till a week after it was dated!'

'Well, perhaps that was the best,' said Nina; 'because I have heard them say that anybody coming suddenly and unprepared in the epidemic, when it is in full force, is almost sure to be taken by it immediately. But you must let me take care of you. Don't you know that I'm mistress of the fortress here—commander-in-chief and head-physician? I shall order you to your room immediately, and Milly shall bring you up some coffee, and then you must have some sleep. You can see with your eyes, now, that we are all safe, and there's nothing to hinder your resting. -Come, let me lead you off, like a captive.'

Released from the pressure of overwhelming fear, Clayton began now to feel the reaction of the bodily and mental straining which he had been enduring for the last twenty-four hours, and therefore he willingly yielded himself to the directions of his little sovereign. Retiring to his room after taking his coffee, which was served by Milly, he fell into a deep and tranquil sleep, which lasted till some time in the afternoon. At first, overcome by fatigue, he slept without dreaming; but, when the first weariness was past, the excitement of the nervous system, under which he had been laboring, began to color his dreams with vague and tumultuous images. He thought he was again with Nina, at Magnolia Grove, and that the servants were passing around in procession, throwing flowers at their feet; but the wreath of orange-blossoms which fell in Nina's lap was tied with black crape. But she took it up, laughing, threw the crape away, and put the wreath on her head, and he heard the chorus singing,

'O, de North Carolina rose!
'O, de North Carolina rose!'

And then the sound seemed to change to one of lamentation, and the floral procession seemed to be a funeral, and a deep melancholy voice like the one he had heard in the woods in the morning, sang,

'Weep, for the rose is withered!
The North Carolina rose!'

He struggled heavily in his sleep, and at last waking, sat up and looked about him. The rays of the evening sun were shining on the tree tops of the distant avenue, and Nina was singing on the veranda below. He listened, and the sound floated up like a rose-leaf carried on a breeze—

'The summer hath its heavy cloud,
The rose-leaf must fall;
But in our home joy wears no shroud—
Never doth it pall!
Each new morning ray
Leaves no sigh for yesterday,
No smile passed away
Would we recall!'

The tune was a favourite melody, which has found much favor with the popular ear, and bore the title of the 'Hindoo Dancing Girl's Song;' and is, perhaps, a fragment of one of those mystical songs in which oriental literature abounds, in which the joy and reunion of earthly love are told in shadowy, symbolic resemblance to the everlasting union of the blessed above. It had a wild, dreamy, soothing power, as verse after verse came floating in, like white doves from paradise, as if they had borne some healing on their wings:

'Then haste to the happy land,
Where sorrow is unknown;
But first in a joyous band,
I'll make thee my own.

'Haste, haste, fly with me,
Where love's banquet waits for thee;]
Thine all its sweets shall be,
Thine, thine, alone!'

A low tap at his door at last aroused him. The door was partly open, and a little hand threw in a half-opened spray of monthly rosebuds.

'There's something to remind you that you are yet in the body!' said a voice in the entry. 'If you are rested, I'll let you come down now.'

And Clayton heard the light footsteps tripping down the stairs. He roused himself, and, after some little attention to his toilet, appeared on the veranda.

'Tea has been waiting for some time,' said Nina. 'I thought I'd give you a hint.'

'I was lying very happy, hearing you sing,' said Clayton. 'You may sing me that song again.'

'Was I singing?' said Nina; 'why, I didn't know it! I believe that's my way of thinking sometimes. I'll sing to you again after tea. I like to sing.'

After tea they were sitting again in the veranda, and the whole heavens were one rosy flush of filmy clouds.

'How beautiful!' said Nina. 'It seems to me I've enjoyed these things, this summer, as I never have before. It seemed as if I felt an influence from them going through me, and filling me as the light does those clouds!'

And as she stood looking up into the sky, she began singing again the words that Clayton had heard before—

'I am come from the happy land,
Where sorrow is unknown;
I have parted a joyous band
To make thee mine own.
'Haste, haste, fly with me,
Where love's banquet waits for thee;
Thine all sweet shall be
Thine, thine, alone.
'The summer has its heavy cloud,
The rose-leaf must fall—'

She stopped her singing suddenly, left the veranda, and went into the house.

'Do you want anything?' said Clayton.

'Nothing!' said she, hurriedly, 'I'll be back in a moment.'

Clayton watched, and saw her go to a closet in which the medicines and cordials were kept, and take something from a glass.

He gave a start of alarm.

'You are not ill, are you?' he said fearfully, as she returned.

'Oh, no! only a little faint. We have become so prudent, you know, that if we feel the least beginning of any disagreeable sensation, we take something at once. I have felt this faintness quite often—it isn't much.'

Clayton put his arm around her, and looked at her with a vague yearning of fear and admiration.

'You look so like a spirit,' he said, 'that I must hold you.'

'Do you think I have a pair of hidden wings?' she said, smiling, and looking gaily in his face?

'I am afraid so,' he said. 'Do you feel quite well now?'

'Yes—I believe so—only—perhaps, we had better sit down. I think, perhaps, it is the reaction of so much excitement makes me feel rather tired.'

Clayton seated her on the settee by the door, still keeping his arm anxiously around her. In a few moments she drooped her head wearily on his shoulder.

'You are ill!' he said, in tones of alarm.

'No!' she said, 'no! I feel very well, only a little faint and tired. It seems to me it is getting a little cold here, isn't it?' she said, with a slight shiver.

Clayton took her up in his arms without speaking, carried her in, and laid her on the sofa. Then rang for Harry and Milly.

'Get a horse instantly,' he said to Harry, as soon as he appeared, 'and go for a doctor.'

'There's no use in sending,' said Nina; 'he is driven to death, and can't come. Besides, there's nothing the matter with me, only I am a little tired and cold. Shut the doors and windows, and cover me up. No, no! don't take me up-stairs; I like to lie here. Just put a shawl over me, that's all—I am thirsty—give me some water.'

The fearful and mysterious disease, which was then in the ascendant, has many forms of approach and development. One, and the most deadly, is that which takes place when a person has so long and gradually imbibed the fatal poisons of an infected atmosphere, that the resisting powers of nature have been insidiously and quietly subdued, so that the subject sinks under it, without any violent outward symptom, by a quiet and certain yielding of the vital powers; such as has been likened to the bleeding to death by an internal wound. In this case, before an hour had passed, though none of the violent and distressing symptoms of the disease appeared, it became evident that the seal of death was set on that fair young brow. A messenger had been despatched, riding with the desperate speed which love and fear can give; but Harry remained in attendance.

'Nothing is the matter with me—nothing is the matter,' she said, 'except fatigue, and this change in the weather; if I only had more over me—and perhaps you had better give me a little brandy, or some such thing. This is water, isn't it, that you have been giving me?'

Alas, it was the strongest brandy, but there was no taste, and the hartshorn that they were holding had no smell. And there was no change in the weather; it was only the creeping deadness affecting the whole outer and inner membranes of the system. Yet, still her voice remained clear, though her mind occasionally wandered. There is a strange impulse which sometimes comes in the restlessness and distress of dissolving nature to sing, and as she lay with her eyes closed, apparently in a sort of trance, she would sing over and over again the verse of the song which she was singing when the blow of the unseen destroyer first struck her,—

'The summer hath its heavy cloud,
The rose-leaf must fall;
But in our land joy wears no shroud—
Never doth it pall.'

At last she opened her eyes, and seeing the agony of all around, the truth seemed to come to her.

'I think I'm called,' she said. 'Oh! I'm so sorry for you all. Don't grieve so. My Father loves me so well, He cannot spare me any longer. He wants me to come to Him—that's all. Don't grieve so. It's home I'm going to—home. 'Twill be only a little while, and you'll come too, all of you. You are satisfied, are you not, Edward?'

And again she relapsed into the dreamy trance, and sung in that strange sweet voice, so low, so weak—

'In our land joy wears no shroud—
Never doth it pall.'

Clayton, what did he? What could he do? What have any of us done, who have sat holding in our arms a dear form, from which the soul was passing?—the soul, for which gladly we would have given our own in exchange; when we have felt it going with inconceivable rapidity from us, and we, ignorant and blind, vainly striving to arrest the inevitable doom, feeling every moment that some other thing might be done to save which is not done, and that that which we are doing may be only hastening the course of the destroyer! Oh, those awful agonized moments, when we watch the clock and no physician comes, and every stroke of the pendulum is like the approaching step of death! Oh, is there anything in heaven or earth for the despair of such hours?

Not a moment was lost by the three around that dying bed, chafing those cold limbs—administering the stimulants which the dead exhausted system no longer felt.

'She doesn't suffer; thank God, at any rate for that,' said Clayton, as he knelt over her in anguish.

A beautiful smile passed over her face as she opened her eyes and looked on them all, and said, 'No, my poor friends, I don't suffer. I'm come to the land where they never suffer. I'm only so sorry for you, Edward,' she said to him. 'Do you remember what you said to me once? it has come now—you must bear it like a man. God calls you to some work—don't shrink from it. You are baptized with fire; it all lasts only a little while—it will be over soon, very soon. Edward, take care of my poor people; tell Tom to be kind to them. My poor, faithful, good Harry! Oh! I'm going so fast!'

The voice sunk into a whispering sigh. Life now seemed to have retreated to the citadel of the brain. She lay apparently in her last sleep, when the footsteps of the doctor were heard on the veranda. There was a general spring to the door; and Doctor Butler entered, pale, haggard, and worn, from constant exertion and loss of rest. He did not say in words that there was no hope, but his first dejected look said it but too plainly. She moved her head a little—like one who is asleep—uneasily upon her pillow, opened her eyes once more, and said, ‘Good-bye! “I will arise and go to my Father.”’

The gentle breath gradually became fainter and fainter. All hope was over! The night walked on with silent and solemn footsteps, and soft showers fell without, murmuring upon the leaves. Within, all was still as death.

‘They watched her breathing through the night,
Her breathing soft and low,
As in her breast the wave of life
Kept heaving to and fro.

‘So silently they seemed to speak,
So slowly moved about,
As they had lent her half their powers
To eke her living out.

‘Their very hopes belied their fears,
Their fears their hopes belied,
They thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died.

‘For when the morn came dim and sad,
And chill with early showers,
Her quiet eyelids closed—she had Another morn than ours.’

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE TIE BREAKS.

CLAYTON remained at Canema several days after the funeral: he had been much affected by the last charge given him by Nina, that he should care for her people; and the scene of distress which he witnessed among them at her death added to the strength of his desire to be of service to them. He spent some time in looking over and arranging Nina’s papers. He sealed up the letters of her different friends, and directed them, in order to be returned to the writers, causing Harry to add to each a memorandum of the time of her death. His heart sunk heavily, when he reflected how little it was possible for any one to do for servants left in the uncontrolled power of a man like Tom Gordon.

The awful words of his father's decision, with regard to the power of the master, never seemed so dreadful as now, when he was to see this unlimited authority passed into the hands of one whose passions were his only law. He recalled, too, what Nina had said of the special bitterness existing between Tom and Harry, and his heart almost failed him when he recollected that the very step which Nina, in her generosity, had taken to save Lisette from his lawlessness, had been the means of placing her without remedy under his power. Under the circumstances he could not but admire the calmness and firmness with which Harry still continued to discharge his duties to the estate, visiting those who were still ailing, and doing his best to prevent their sinking into a panic which might predispose to another attack of disease. Recollecting that Nina had said something of some kind of a contract by which Harry's freedom was to be secured in case of her death, he resolved to speak with him on the subject. As they were together in the library, looking over the papers, Clayton said to him,—

‘Harry, is there not some kind of contract or understanding with the guardians of the estate by which your liberty was secured in case of the death of your mistress?’

‘Yes,’ said Harry, ‘there is such a paper. I was to have my freedom on paying a certain sum, which is all paid but five hundred dollars.’

‘I will advance you that money,’ said Clayton, unhesitatingly, ‘if that is all that is necessary; let me see the paper.’

Harry produced it, and Clayton looked it over. It was a regular contract, drawn in proper form, and with no circumstance wanting to give it validity. Clayton, however, knew enough of the law which regulates the conditions in which Harry stood, to know that it was of no more avail in his case than so much blank paper. He did not like to speak of it, but sat reading it over, weighing every word, and dreading the moment when he should be called upon to make some remark concerning it, knowing as he did, that what he had to say must dash all Harry's hopes, the hopes of his whole life. While he was hesitating, a servant entered and announced Mr. Jekyl, and that gentleman, with a business-like directness which usually characterised his movements, entered the library immediately after.

‘Good morning, Mr. Clayton,’ he said; and then, nodding patronizingly to Harry, he helped himself to a chair, and stated his business without further preamble.

'I have received orders from Mr. Gordon to come and take possession of the estate and chattles of his deceased sister without delay.'

As Clayton sat perfectly silent, it seemed to occur to Mr. Jekyl that a few moral reflections of a general nature would be in etiquette on the present occasion; he therefore added, in the tone of voice which he reserved particularly for that style of remark, 'We have been called upon to pass through most solemn and afflicting dispensations of Divine Providence lately. Mr. Clayton, these things remind us of the shortness of life and of the necessity of preparation for death.'

Mr. Jekyl paused, and as Clayton still sat silent, he went on,—
'There was no will, I presume?'

'No,' said Clayton, 'there was not.'

'Ah, so I supposed,' said Mr. Jekyl, who had now recovered his worldly tone. 'In that case, of course, the whole property reverts to the heir at law, just as I had imagined.'

'Perhaps Mr. Jekyl would look at this paper,' said Harry taking his contract from the hand of Mr. Clayton, and passing it to Mr. Jekyl, who took out his spectacles, placed them deliberately on his sharp nose, and read the paper through.

'Were you under the impression,' said he to Harry, 'that this is a legal document?'

'Certainly,' said Harry; 'I can bring witnesses to prove Mr. John Gordon's signature and Miss Nina's also.'

'Oh, that's all evident enough,' said Mr. Jekyl; 'I know Mr. John Gordon's signature; but all the signatures in the world couldn't make it a valid contract. You see, my boy,' he said, turning to Harry, 'a slave not being a person in the eye of the law, cannot have a contract made with him. The law, which is based on the old Roman code, holds him pro nullis pro mortuis, which means, Harry, that he's held as nothing, as dead inert substance; that's his position in law.'

'I believe,' said Harry, in a strong and bitter tone, 'that is what religious people call a Christian institution.'

'Hey!' said Mr. Jekyl, elevating his eyebrows, 'what's that?'

Harry repeated his remark; and Mr. Jekyl replied in the most literal manner,—

'Of course it is. It is a Divine ordering, and ought to be met in a proper spirit. There's no use, my boy, in rebellion—"Hath not the potter power over the clay to make one lump to honour and another to dishonour?"'

‘Mr. Jekyl, I think it would be expedient to confine the conversation simply to legal matters,’ said Clayton.

‘Oh, certainly,’ said Mr. Jekyl; ‘and this brings me to say that I have orders from Mr. Gordon to stay till he comes, and keep order on the place; also that none of the hands shall at any time leave the plantation until he arrives. I brought two or three officers with me, in case there should be any necessity for enforcing order.’

‘When will Mr. Gordon be here?’ said Clayton.

‘To-morrow, I believe,’ said Mr. Jekyl. ‘Young man,’ he added, turning to Harry, ‘you can produce the papers and books, and I can be attending to the accounts.’

Clayton rose and left the room, leaving Harry with the imperturbable Mr. Jekyl, who plunged briskly into the business of the accounts, talking to Harry with as much freedom and composure as if he had not just been destroying the hopes of his whole lifetime. If, by any kind of inward clairvoyance, or sudden clearing of his mental vision, Mr. Jekyl could have been made to appreciate the anguish which at that moment overwhelmed the soul of the man with whom he was dealing, we deem it quite possible that he might have been moved to a transient emotion of pity. Even a thorough-paced political economist may sometimes be surprised in this way by the near view of a case of actual irremediable distress; but he would soon have consoled himself by a species of mental algebra, that the greatest good of the greatest number was nevertheless secure, therefore there was no occasion to be troubled about infinitesimal amounts of suffering. In this way people can reason away every kind of distress but their own; for it is very remarkable, that even so slight an ailment as a moderate toothache will put this kind of philosophy entirely to rout.

‘It appears to me,’ said Mr. Jekyl, looking at Harry after awhile with more attention than he had yet given him, ‘that something is the matter with you this morning. An’t you well?’

‘In body,’ said Harry, ‘I am well.’

‘Well, what is the matter, then?’ said Mr. Jekyl.

‘The matter is,’ said Harry, ‘that I have all my life been toiling for my liberty, and thought I was coming nearer to it every year; and now, at thirty-five years of age, I find myself still a slave, with no hope of ever getting free.’

Mr. Jekyl perceived from the outside that there was something the matter inside of his human brother, some unknown quantity in the way of suffering, such as his algebra gave no rule for ascertaining. He had a confused notion that this was an affliction, and that when people were in affliction they must be talked to, and he proceeded accordingly to talk.

‘My boy, this is a dispensation of Divine Providence.’

‘I call it a dispensation of human tyranny!’ said Harry.

‘It pleased the Lord,’ continued Mr. Jekyl, ‘to foredoom the race of Ham.’

‘Mr. Jekyl, that humbug don’t go down with me. I’m no more of the race of Ham than you are. I’m Colonel Gordon’s oldest son, as white as my brother whom you say owns me. Look at my eyes and my hair, and say if any of the rules about Ham pertain to me!’

‘Well,’ said Mr. Jekyl, ‘my boy, you mustn’t get excited; everything must go, you know, by general rules; we must take that course which secures the greatest general amount of good on the whole, and all such rules will work hard in particular cases. Slavery is a great missionary enterprise for civilizing and Christianizing the degraded African.’

‘Wait till you see Toim Gordon’s management on this plantation,’ said Harry, ‘and you’ll see what sort of a Christianizing institution it is. Mr. Jekyl, you know better; you throw such talk as that in the face of your northern visitors, and you know all the while that Sodom and Gomorrah don’t equal some of these plantations, where nobody is anybody’s husband or wife in particular. You know all these things, and you dare talk to me about a missionary institution. What sort of missionary institutions are the great trading marts where they sell men and women? What are the means of grace they use there? And the dogs and the negro-hunters, those are for the greatest good too! If your soul were in our souls’ stead, you’d see things differently!’

Mr. Jekyl was astonished, and said so. But he found a difficulty in presenting his favourite view of the case under the circumstances; and we believe those ministers of the Gospel, and elders, who entertain similar doctrines, would gain some new views by the effort to present them to a live man in Harry’s circumstances. Mr. Jekyl never had a more realizing sense of the difference between the abstract and concrete.

Harry was now thoroughly roused; he had inherited the violent and fiery passions of his father. His usual appearance of apparent calmness, and his habits of deferential address were superinduced; they resembled the thin crust which coats over a flood of boiling lava, and which a burst of the seething flood beneath can shiver in a moment. He was now wholly desperate and reckless. He saw himself already delivered, bound hand and foot, into the hands of a master from whom he could expect neither mercy nor justice. He was like one who had hung suspended over an abyss by grasping a wild rose; the frail, beautiful thing was broken, and he felt himself going with only despair beneath him. He rose, and stood the other side of the table, his hands trembling with excitement.

'Mr. Jekyl,' he said, 'it is all over with me. Twenty years of faithful service have gone for nothing; myself, and wife, and unborn child are the slaves of a vile wretch! Hush, now; I will have my say for once. I've borne, and borne, and borne, and it shall come out. You men who call yourselves religious, and stand up for such tyranny! you serpents, you generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell? You keep the clothes of those who stoned Stephen—you encourage theft, and robbery, and adultery, and you know it. You are worse than the villains themselves, who don't pretend to justify what they do. Now go, tell Tom Gordon—go! I shall fight it out to the last! I've nothing to hope, and nothing to lose! Let him look out—they made sport of Samson, they put out his eyes; but he pulled down the temple over their heads, after all. Look out!'

There is something awful in an outburst of violent passion. The veins in Harry's forehead were swollen, his lips were livid, his eyes glittered like lightning, and Mr. Jekyl cowered before him.

'There will come a day,' said Harry, 'when all this shall be visited upon you; the measure you have filled to us shall be filled to you double, mark my words!'

Harry spoke so loudly in his vehemence that Clayton overheard him, and came behind him silently into the room. He was pained, shocked and astonished, and obeying the first instinct, he came forward, and laid his hand entreatingly on Harry's shoulder.

'My good fellow, you don't know what you're saying,' he said.

'Yes I do,' said Harry, 'and my words will be true.'

Another witness had come behind Clayton—Tom Gordon in his travelling-dress—with pistols at his belt. He had ridden over after Jekyl, and had arrived in time to hear part of Harry's frantic ravings.

'Stop,' he said, stepping into the middle of the room, 'leave that fellow to me. Now, boy,' he said, fixing his dark and evil eye upon Harry, 'you didn't know that your master was hearing you, did you? The last time we met, you told me I wasn't your master, now we'll see if you'll say that again: you went whimpering to your mistress and got her to buy Lisette, so as to keep her out of my way. Now who owns her?—say! Do you see this?' he said, holding up a long lithe gutta percha cane: 'this is what I whip dogs with, when they don't know their place. Now, sir, down on your knees and ask pardon for your impudence, or I'll thrash you within an inch of your life.'

'I won't kneel to my younger brother,' said Harry.

With a tremendous oath Tom struck him; and as if a rebound from the stroke, Harry struck back a blow so violent as to send him stumbling across the room against the opposite wall, then turned quick as thought, sprung through the open window, climbed down the veranda, vaulted on to Tom's horse, which stood tied at the post, and fled as rapidly as lightning to his cottage door, where Lisette stood at an ironing-table, he reached out his hand and said, 'Up quick, Lisette, Tom Gordon's here; and before Tom Gordon had fairly recovered from the dizziness into which the blow had thrown him, the fleet blood-horse was whirling Harry and Lisette past bush and tree, till they arrived at the place where he had twice before met Dred: Dred was standing there.

'Even so,' he said, as the horse stopped, and Harry and Lisette descended, 'the vision is fulfilled: behold the Lord shall make thee a witness and commander to the people!'

'There's no time to be lost,' said Harry.

'Well, I know that,' said Dred; 'come, follow me.'

And before sunset of that evening, Harry and Lisette were tenants of the wild fastness in the centre of the swamp.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE PURPOSE.

It would be scarcely possible to describe the scene which Harry left in the library. Tom Gordon was for a few moments stunned by the violence of his fall. And Clayton and Mr. Jekyl at first did not know but he had sustained some serious injury; and the latter, in his confusion, came very near attempting his recovery by pouring in his face the contents of the large inkstand—certainly quite as appropriate a method under the circumstances, as the exhortations with which he had deluged Harry. But Clayton, with more presence of mind, held his hand, and rang for water. In a few moments, however, Tom recovered himself, and started up furiously.

‘Where is he?’ he shouted, with a volley of oaths, which made Mr. Jekyl pull up his shirt-collar, as became a good Presbyterian elder, preparatory to a little admonition.

‘My young friend—’ he begun.

‘Blast you—none of your young friends to me—where is he?’

‘He has escaped,’ said Clayton, quietly.

‘He got right out of the window,’ said Mr. Jekyl.

‘Confound you! why didn’t you stop him?’ said Tom, violently.

‘If that question is addressed to me,’ said Clayton, ‘I do not interfere in your family affairs.’

‘You have interfered more than you ever shall again,’ said Tom, roughly. ‘But there’s no use talking now; that fellow must be chased! He thinks he’s got away from me;—we’ll see. I’ll make such an example of him as shall be remembered. He rang the bell violently—‘Jim,’ he said, ‘did you see Harry go off on my horse?’

‘Yes, sah.’

‘Then, why in thunder didn’t you stop him?’

‘I thought Mas’ Tom sent him—did so!’

‘You knew better, you dog, and now I tell you—order out the best horses, and be on after him. And if you don’t catch him, it shall be the worse for you?—Stay—get me a horse, I’ll go myself.’

Clayton saw that it was useless to remain any longer at Canema. He therefore ordered his horse, and departed. Tom Gordon cast an evil eye after him as he rode away.

‘I hate that fellow!’ he said, ‘and I will make him mischief one of these days, if I can.’

As to Clayton, he rode away in bitterness of spirit. There are some men so constituted, that the sight of injustice which they have no power to remedy is perfectly maddening to them. This is a very painful and unprofitable constitution, so far as this world is concerned; but they can no more help it than they can the toothache. Others may say to them, ‘Why, what is it to you?—You can’t help it, and it’s none of your concern;’ but still the fever burns on. Besides, Clayton had just passed through one of the great crises of life. All there is in that strange mystery of what man can feel for woman, had risen like a wave within him, gathering into itself for the time the whole force of his being;—had broken with one dash on the shore of death; and the waters had flowed helplessly backward. In the great void which follows such a crisis, the soul sets up a craving and a cry for something to come in to fill the emptiness. And while the heart says no person can come into that desolate and sacred enclosure, it sometimes embraces a purpose, as in some sort a substitute.

In this manner, with solemnity and earnestness, Clayton resolved to receive as a life-purpose a struggle with this great system of injustice, which like a parasitic weed had struck its roots through the whole growth of society, and was sucking thence its moisture and nourishment.

As he rode through the lonely pine woods, he felt his veins throbbing and swelling with indignation and desire. And there arose within him that sense of power which sometimes seems to come over man like an inspiration, and leads him to say—‘this shall not be, and this shall be,’—as if he possessed the ability to control the crooked course of human events. He was thankful in his heart that he had taken the first step, by entering his public protest against this injustice in quitting the bar of his native state. What was next to be done? How the evil was to be attacked, how the vague purpose fulfilled, he could not say. Clayton was not aware, any more than others in his situation have been, of what he was undertaking. He had belonged to an old and respected family, and always as a matter of course been received in all circles with attention, and listened to with respect. He who glides dreamily down the glassy surface of a mighty river floats securely, making his calculations to row upward. He knows nothing what the force of that seemingly-glassy current will be, when his one feeble oar is set against the whole volume of its waters. Clayton did not know that he was already a marked man; that he had touched a spot, in the society where he lived, which was vital, and which that society would never suffer to be touched with impunity. It was the fault of Clayton, and it is the fault of all such men, that he judged mankind by himself. He could not believe that anything except ignorance and inattention could make men upholders of deliberate injustice. He thought all that was necessary was the enlightening of the public mind, the direction of general attention to the subject. In his way homeward he revolved in his mind immediate measures of action. This evil should no longer be tampered with. He would take on himself the task of combining and concentrating those vague impulses towards good, which he supposed were existing in the community. He would take counsel of leading minds. He would give his time to journeyings through the state. He would deliver addresses, write in the newspapers, and do what otherwise lies in the power of a free man, who wishes to reach an utterly unjust law. Full of these determinations Clayton entered again his father's house, after two days of solitary riding. He had written in advance to his parents of the death of Nina, and had begged them to spare him any conversation on that subject; and therefore in his first meeting with his mother and father there was that painful blank—that heavy dulness of suffering—which comes when people meet together, feeling deeply on one absorbing subject which must not be named. It was a greater self-denial to his impulsive warm-hearted mother than to Clayton. She yearned to express sympathy, to throw herself upon his neck, to draw forth his feelings and mingle them with her own. But there are some people with whom this is impossible; it seems to be their fate that they can not speak of what they suffer. It is not pride nor coldness, but a kind of fatal necessity, as if the body were a marble prison in which the soul were condemned to bleed and suffer alone. It is the last triumph of affliction and magnanimity when a loving heart can respect that suffering silence of its beloved, and allow that lonely liberty in which only some natures can find comfort.

Clayton's sorrow could only be measured by the eagerness and energy with which, in conversation, he pursued the object with which he endeavoured to fill his mind.

'I am far from looking forward with hope to any success from your efforts,' said Judge Clayton; 'the evil is so radical.'

'I sometimes think,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'that I regret that Edward began as he did—it was such a shock to the prejudices of people.'

'People have got to be shocked,' said Clayton, 'in order to wake them up out of old absurd routine. Use paralyses us to almost every injustice; when people are shocked they begin to think and to inquire.'

'But would it not have been better,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'to have preserved your personal influence, and thus have insinuated your opinions more gradually? There is such a prejudice against abolitionists; and when a man makes any sudden demonstration on this subject, people are apt to call him an abolitionist, and then his influence is all gone, and he can do nothing.'

'I suspect,' said Clayton, 'there are multitudes now in every part of our state who are kept from expressing what they really think, and doing what they ought to do by this fear. Somebody must brave this mad-dog cry—somebody must be willing to be odious, and I shall answer the purpose as well as anybody.'

'Have you any definite plan of what is to be attempted?' said his father.

'Of course,' said Clayton, 'a man's first notions on such a subject must be crude; but it occurred to me first to endeavour to excite the public mind on the injustice of the present slave law, with a view to altering it.'

'And what points would you alter?' said Judge Clayton.

'I would give to the slave the right to bring suit for injury, and to be a legal witness in court. I would repeal the law forbidding their education, and I would forbid the separation of families.'

Judge Clayton sat pondering.

At length he said, 'And how will you endeavour to excite the public mind?'

'I should appeal first,' said Clayton, 'to the church and the ministry.'

'You can try it,' said his father.

'Why,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'these reforms are so evidently called for by justice and humanity, and the spirit of the age, that I can have no doubt that there will be a general movement among all good people in their favour.'

Judge Clayton made no reply. There are some cases where silence is the most disagreeable kind of dissent, because it admits of no argument in reply.

'In my view,' said Clayton, 'the cause of legal reform in the first place should remove all those circumstances in the condition of the slaves which tend to keep them in ignorance and immorality, and make the cultivation of self-respect impossible; such as the want of education, protection in the family state, and the legal power of obtaining redress for injuries. After that the next step would be to allow those masters who are so disposed to emancipate, giving proper security for the good behaviour of their servants. They might then retain them as tenants.

Under this system emancipation would go on gradually; only the best masters would at first emancipate, and the example would be gradually followed. The experiment would soon demonstrate the superior cheapness and efficiency of the system of free labour, and self-interest would then come in to complete what principle began. It is only the first step that costs. But it seems to me that in the course of my life I have met with multitudes of good people groaning in secret under the evils and injustice of slavery, who would gladly give their influence to any reasonable effort which promises in time to ameliorate and remove them.'

'The trouble is,' said Judge Clayton, 'that the system, though ruinous in the long run to communities, is immediately profitable to individuals. Besides this it is a source of political influence and importance. The holders of slaves are an aristocracy, supported by special constitutional privileges. They are united, against the spirit of the age, by a common interest and danger, and the instinct of self-preservation is infallible. No logic is so accurate. As a matter of personal feeling many slave-holders would rejoice in some of the humane changes which you propose; but they see at once that any change endangers the perpetuity of the system on which their political importance depends. Therefore, they'll resist you at the very outset, not because they would not, many of them, be glad to have justice done, but because they think they cannot afford it. They will have great patience with you; they will even have sympathy with you, so long as you confine yourself merely to the expression of feeling, but the moment your efforts produce the slightest movement in the community, then, my son, you will see human nature in a new aspect, and know more about mankind than you know now.'

'Very well,' said Clayton, 'the sooner the better.'

'Well, Edward,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'if you are going to begin with the ministry, why don't you go and talk to your uncle Cushing. He is one of the most influential among the Presbyterians in the whole state, and I have often heard him lament in the strongest manner the evils of slavery. He has told me some facts about its effect on the character of his church members, both bond and free, that are terrible.'

'Yes,' said Judge Clayton, 'your brother will do all that; he will lament the evils of slavery in private circles, and he'll furnish you any number of facts, if you will not give his authority for them.'

‘And don’t you think that he will be willing to do something?’

‘No,’ said Judge Clayton, ‘not if the cause is unpopular.’

‘Why,’ said Mrs. Clayton, ‘do you suppose that my brother will be deterred from doing his duty for fear of personal unpopularity?’

‘No,’ said Judge Clayton; ‘but your brother has the interest of Zion on his shoulders, by which he means the Presbyterian organization, and he will say that he can’t afford to risk his influence. And the same will be true of every leading minister of every denomination. The Episcopalians are keeping watch over Episcopacy—the Methodists over Methodism—the Baptists over Baptism. None of them dare espouse an unpopular cause, lest the others, taking advantage of it, should go beyond them in public favour. None of them will want the odium of such a reform as this.’

‘But I don’t see any odium in it,’ said Mrs. Clayton; ‘it’s one of the noblest and one of the most necessary of all possible changes.’

‘Nevertheless,’ said Judge Clayton, ‘it will be made to appear extremely odious. The catchwords of abolition, incendiarism, fanaticism, will fly thick as hail. And the storm will be just in proportion to the real power of the movement. It will probably end in Edward’s expulsion from the state.’

‘My father, I should be unwilling to think,’ said Clayton, ‘that the world is quite so bad as you represent it, particularly the religious world.’

‘I was not aware that I was representing it as very bad,’ said Judge Clayton. ‘I only mentioned such facts as everybody can see about them. There are, undoubtedly, excellent men in the church.’

‘But,’ said Clayton, ‘did not the church in the primitive ages stand against the whole world in arms? If religion be anything must it not take the lead of society, and be its sovereign and teacher, and not its slave?’

‘I don’t know as to that,’ said Judge Clayton. ‘I think you’ll find the facts much as I have represented them. What the church was in the primitive ages, or what it ought to be now, is not at all to our purpose in making practical calculations. Without any disrespect I wish to speak of things just as they are. Nothing is ever gained by false expectations.’

‘Oh!’ said Mrs. Clayton, ‘you lawyers get so uncharitable. I’m quite sure that Edward will find brother ready to go heart and hand with him.’

'I'm sure I shall be glad of it if he does,' said Judge Clayton.

'I shall write to him about it immediately,' said Mrs. Clayton, 'and Edward shall go and talk with him. Courage, Edward! our woman's instincts, after all, have some prophetic power in them. At all events we women will stand by you to the last.'

Clayton sighed—he remembered the note Nina had written him, and thought what a brave-hearted little creature she was. And, like the faint breath of a withered rose, the shadowy remembrance of her seemed to say to him, 'Go on.'

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE NEW MOTHER.

THE cholera at length disappeared, and the establishment of our old friend Tiff proceeded as of yore. His chickens and turkeys grew to maturity, and cackled and strutted joyously. His corn waved its ripening flags in the September breezes. The grave of the baby had grown green with its first coat of grass, and Tiff was comforted for his loss—because as he said, 'he knowed he was better off.' Miss Fanny grew healthy and strong, and spent many long sunny hours wandering in the woods with Teddy; or, sitting out on the bench where Nina had been wont to read to them, would spell out with difficulty, for her old friend's comfort and enlightenment, the half-familiar words of the wondrous story that Nina had brought to their knowledge. The interior of the poor cottage bore its wonted air of quaint sylvan refinement, and Tiff went on with his old dream of imagining it an ancestral residence, of which his young master and mistress were the head, and himself their whole retinue. He was sitting in his tent door in the cool of the day, while Teddy and Fanny had gone for wild grapes, cheerfully examining and mending his old pantaloons, meanwhile recreating his soul with a cheerful conversation with himself.

'Now, old Tiff,' said he, 'one more patch on dese yere—because it ain't much matter what you wears. Massa is allers a promising to bring home some cloth for to make a more 'spectable pair, but laws he never does nothing he says he will. Ain't no trusting in dat 'scription of people—jiggeting up and down de country—drinking at all de taverns—fetching de 'sgrace on de family in spite of all I can do—mighty long time since he been home any how—shouldn't wonder if de cholera had cotched him—well, de Lord's will be done—pity to kill such critturs—wouldn't much mind if he should die—laws, he ain't much profit to de family—coming home here wid lots of old trash—drinking up all my chicken money, down to 'Bijah Skin-flint—for my part, I believe dem devils when dey went out of de swine went into de whiskey barrel—Dis yer liquor makes folks so ugly—Teddy shan't never touch none as long as there is a drop of Peyton blood in my veins—Lord, but dis yer world is full of dispensations—poor dear Miss Nina, that was so doing for the chil'en, she is gone up among the angels. Well, bress de Lord—we must do de best we can—and we'll all land on de Canaan shore at last.'

And Tiff uplifted a quivering stave of a favourite melody—

'My brethren, I have found
The land that doth abound
With food as sweet as manna;
The more I eat, I find
The more I am inclined
To shout and sing Hosannah.'

'Shoo, shoo, shoo,' he said, observing certain long-legged half-grown chickens, who were surreptitiously taking advantage of his devotional engrossments to rush past him into the kitchen.

'Pears like dese yere chickens never will learn nothing,' said Tiff, finding that his vigorous shooing only scared the whole flock in, instead of admonishing them out. So Tiff had to lay down his work, and his thimble rolled one way, and his cake of wax another, hiding themselves under the leaves; while the hens, seeing Tiff at the door, instead of accepting his polite invitation to walk out, acted in that provoking inconsiderate way that hens generally will, running promiscuously up and down, flapping their wings, cackling, upsetting pots, kettles, and pans in promiscuous ruin, Tiff each moment becoming more and more wrathful at their entire want of consideration.

'Bress me, if I ever did see any kind of creature so shallow as hens,' said Tiff; as, having finally ejected them, he was busy repairing the ruin they had wrought in Miss Fanny's fanciful floral arrangements, which were all lying in wild confusion. 'I thought de Lord made room in every beast's head for some sense, but 'pears like hens arn't got de leastest grain. Puts me out seeing them crawling and crawling on one leg, 'cause dey haven't sense enough to know where to sit down with t'other. Dey never has no idea what dey going to do I believe; but den dar folks dat's just like them that de Lord has gin brains to, and dey won't use them. Dey's always settin round, but dey never lays no eggs—so hens ain't de worst critturs arter all. And I really don't know what we should do without dem,' said old Tiff, relentingly, as appeased from his wrath, he took up at once his needle and his psalm, singing lustily and with good courage,

‘Perhaps you'd think me wild
And simple as a child;
But I'm a child of glory.’

‘Laws now,’ said Tiff, pursuing his reflections to himself, ‘may be he is dead now sure enough, and if he is, why I can do for de chil'en real powerful. I sold right smart of eggs dis yere summer, and de sweet potatoes always fetches a good price. If I could only get de chil'en along with de reading, and keep dere manners handsome. Why, Miss Fanny now, she is growing up to be real pretty. She got de real Peyton look to her, and dere's dis yere about gals and women that if dey's pretty why somebody wants to be marryin of dem, and so dey gets took care of. I tell you dey shan't any of dem fellows that he brings home with him, have nothin to say to her. Peyton blood ain't for der money, I can tell dem. Dem fellows allers find demselves mighty unlucky as long as I'se round. One thing or another happens to dem, so dat dey don't want to come no more. Dreadful poor times dey has,’ and Tiff shook with a secret chuckle.

‘But now ye see there's never any knowing dar may be some Peyton property coming to dese yere chil'en. I have know sich things happen before now. ‘Lawyers calling after de heirs, and den here dey be already fetched up—I'se minding that I had better speak to Miss Nina's man about dese yere chil'en. Because he is a nice pretty man, and naturally he would take an interest. And dat ar handsome sister of his dat was so thick with Miss Nina, may be she would be doing something for her. Any way dese yere chil'en shall never come to want, as long as I'se 'bove ground.’

Alas for the transitory nature of human expectation! Even our poor little Arcadia in the wilderness, where we have had so many hours of quaint delight, was destined to feel the mutability of all earthly joys and prospects. Even while Tiff spoke and sung in the exuberance of joy and sincerity of his soul, a disastrous phantom was looming up from a distance—the phantom of Cripps' own waggon. Cripps was not dead, as was to have been hoped, but returning for a more permanent residence, bringing with him a bride of his own heart's choosing. Tiff's dismay—his utter speechless astonishment—may be imagined, when the ill-favoured machine rumbled up to the door, and Cripps produced from it what seemed to be at first glance a bundle of tawdry dirty finery, but at last it turned out to be a woman so far gone in intoxication, as scarcely to be sensible of what she was doing. Evidently she was one of the lowest of that class of poor whites, whose wretched condition is not among the least of the evils of slavery. Whatever she might have been naturally—whatever of beauty or of good there might have been in the womanly nature within her—lay wholly withered and eclipsed under the force of an education, churchless, schoolless—with all the vices of civilisation without its refinements, and all the vices of barbarism without the occasional nobility by which they are sometimes redeemed. A low and vicious connection with this woman had at last terminated in marriage; such marriages as one shudders to think of, where gross animal natures come together without even a glimmering idea of the higher purposes of that holy relation.

'Tiff, this yere is your new mistress,' said Cripps, with an idiotic laugh; 'plaguy nice gal too. I thought I'd bring the children a mother to take care of them. Come along, gal.'

Looking closer, we recognize in the woman our old acquaintance Polly Skinflint.

He pulled the woman forward, and she coming in, seated herself on Fanny's bed. Tiff looked as if he could have struck her dead. An avalanche had fallen upon him. He stood in the door with the slack hand of utter despair, while she, swinging her heels, began leisurely spitting about her in every direction the juice of a quid of tobacco which she cherished in one cheek.

'Durned if this yere ain't pretty well,' she said. 'Only I want de nigger to heave that ar trash,' pointing to Fanny's flowers; 'I don't want the children sticking no herbs round my house. Hey, you nigger! heave out that trash.'

As Tiff stood still, not obeying this call, the woman appeared angry, and coming up to him struck him on the side of the head.

'Oh, come, come, Poll,' said Cripps, 'you be still. He ain't used to no such ways.'

'Cripps,' said the amiable lady, turning round to him, 'you go

'long. Didn't you tell me if I married you I should have a nigger to order round just as I pleased.'

'Well, well,' said Cripps, who was not by any means a cruelly-disposed man, 'I did not think you'd want to go wallopping him the first thing.'

'I will, if he don't shin round,' said the virago, 'and you too;' and this vigorous profession was further carried out by a vigorous shove, which reacted in Cripps in the form of a cuff, and in a few moments the disgraceful scuffle was at its full height, and Tiff turned with disgust and horror from the house.

'Oh, good Lord!' he said to himself, 'we doesn't know what's before us, and I was feeling so bad when de Lord took my poor little man, and now I'se ready to go down on my knees to thank de Lord that he is took him away from the evil to come. To think of my poor sweet lamb, Miss Fanny, as I've been bringing up so careful—Lord des yere is a heap worse than de cholera.'

It was with great affliction and dismay that he saw the children coming forward in high spirits, bearing between them a basket of wild grapes, which they had been gathering. He ran out to meet them.

'Laws, you poor lambs,' he said, 'you doesn't know what's a coming on you. Your pa has gone and married a dre'ful low white woman, such as ain't fit for no Christian children to speak to. And now they's quarrelling and fighting in dere like two heathens, and Miss Nina is dead, and dere's no place for you to go to.' And the old man sat down and actually wept aloud, while the children, frightened, got into his arms, and nestled close to him for protection, crying too.

'What shall we do? What shall we do?' said Fanny; and Teddy, who always repeated reverentially all his sister's words, said after her, in a deplorable whimper,

'What shall we do?'

'I'se a good mind to go off with you in de wilderness, like de children of Israel,' said Tiff. 'Tho' there ain't no manna fallen now-a-days.'

'Tiff, does marrying father make her our ma?' said Fanny.

'No, 'deed, Miss Fanny, it doesn't. Your ma was one of de firstest old Virginia families. It was just throwing herself away, marrying him. I never said dat ar before, cause it warn't 'spectful, but I don't care now.'

At this moment Cripps' voice was heard shouting—

'Hallo, you Tiff! where is the durn nigger; I say come back Poll and I is made it up now. Bring 'long dem children, and let them get acquainted with their mammy,' he said, laying hold of Fanny's hand, and drawing her frightened, and crying, towards the house.

'Don't you be afraid, child,' said Cripps; 'I've brought you a new ma.'

'We didn't want any new ma,' said Teddy, in a dolorous voice.

'Oh, yes, you do,' said Cripps, coaxing him. 'Come along, my little man. There's your mammy,' he said, pushing him into the fat embrace of Polly. 'Fanny, go kiss your ma.'

Fanny hung back and cried, and Teddy followed her example.

'Confound the durn young uns,' said the new-married lady. 'I told you, Cripps, I didn't want no brats of t'other woman's; be plague enough when I get some of my own.'

CHAPTER XL.

THE FLIGHT INTO EGYPT.

THE once neat and happy cottage, of which old Tiff was the guardian genius, soon experienced sad reverses. Polly Skinflint's violent and domineering temper made her absence from her father's establishment rather a matter of congratulation to Abijah. Her mother, one of those listless and inefficient women whose lives flow in a calm muddy current of stupidity and laziness, talked very little about it; but on the whole was perhaps better contented to be out of the range of Polly's sharp voice and long arms. It was something of a consideration, in Abijah's shrewd view of things, that Cripps owned a nigger, the first point to which the aspiration of the poor white of the South generally tends. Polly, whose love of power was a predominant element in her nature, resolutely declared in advance "She'd make him shin round, or she'd know the reason why." As to the children, she regarded them as the incumbrances of the estate, to be got over with in the best way possible; for as she graphically remarked, 'Every durned young 'un had to look out when she was about.' The bride had been endowed with a marriage portion by her father of half a barrel of whiskey, and it was announced, that Cripps was tired of trading round the country, and meant to set up trading at home. In short, the little cabin became a low grogshop, a resort of the most miserable and vicious portion of the community. The violent temper of Polly soon drove Cripps upon his travels again, and his children were left unprotected to the fury of their stepmother's temper. Every vestige of whatever was decent about the house and garden was soon swept away; for the customers of the shop in a grand Sunday drinking-bout amused themselves with tearing down even the prairie rose and climbing vine that once gave a sylvan charm to the rude dwelling. Polly's course in the absence of her husband was one of gross, unblushing licentiousness, and the ears and eyes of the children were shocked with language and scenes too bad for repetition.

Old Tiff was almost heart-broken. He would have borne the beatings and starvings which came on himself, but the abuse which came on the children he could not bear. One night when the drunken orgy was raging within the house, Tiff gathered courage from despair.

'Miss Fanny,' he said, 'jist go in de garret and make a bundle of sich tings as dey is, and throw dem out of de window. I'se been a praying night and day, and de Lord says He'll open some way or oder for us. I'll keep Teddy out here under de trees, while you jist bundles up what poor clothes is left and throw dem out of de window.'

Silently as a ray of moonlight, the pale, fair, delicate-looking child glided through the room, where her stepmother and two or three drunken men were revelling in a loathsome debauch.

'Hallo, Sis!' cried one of the men after her, 'where are you going to? Stop here and give me a kiss.'

The unutterable look of mingled pride and fear and angry distress which the child cast, as quick as thought she turned from them, and ran up the ladder into the loft, occasioned roars of laughter.

'I say, Bill, why didn't you catch her?' said one.

'Oh, no matter for that,' said another, 'she'll come of her own accord one of these days.'

Fanny's heart beat like a frightened bird, as she made up her little bundle, then throwing it out to Tiff, who was below in the dark, she called out in a low earnest whisper—

'Tiff! put up that board, and I'll climb down on it. I won't go back among those dreadful men.'

Carefully, and noiselessly as possible, Tiff lifted a long rough slab, and placed it against the side of the house. Carefully Fanny set her little feet on the top of it, and spreading her arms, came down like a little puff of vapour into the arms of her faithful attendant.

'Bress de Lord! here we is all right!' said Tiff.

'Oh, Tiff, I'm so glad!' said Teddy, holding fast by the skirt of Tiff's apron, and jumping for joy.

'Yes,' said Tiff, 'all right! Now de angel of de Lord will go wid us into de wilderness.'

'There's plenty of angels there, ain't there?' said Teddy, victoriously, as he lifted the little bundle with undoubting faith.

'Lord, yes!' said Tiff; 'I don't know why dere shouldn't be in our days. Any rate, de Lord appeared to me in a dream, and says he, "Tiff, rise and take de chil'en, and go into de land of Egypt, and be dere till de time I tell thee." Dem is de very words, and it was between the cock-crow and daylight dey come to me, when I had been lying dar praying like a hailstorm all night; not giving de Lord no rest. Says I to Him, says I, "Lord, I don't know nothing what to do, and now if you was poor as I be, and I was great king like you, I'd help you; and now Lord," says I, "you must help us, because we ain't got no place else to go; because you know Miss Nina she is dead, and Mr. John Gordon too, and dis yere woman will ruin dese yere children, if you don't help us. And now I hope you won't be angry, but I has to be very bold, 'cause tings have got so, dat we can't bear dem no longer." Den you see, I dropped asleep, and I hadn't no more dan got asleep, just after cock-crow, when de voice come.'

'And is this the land of Egypt,' said Teddy, 'that we're going to?'

'I 'spect so,' said Tiff. 'Don't you know de story dat Miss Nina read to you once, how de angel of de Lord appeared to Hagar in de wilderness, when she was sitting down under de bush. Den dere was another one come to 'Lijah, when he was under de juniper-tree, when he was wandering up and down and got hungry, and woke up, and dere, sure enough, was a corn-cake, baking for him on de coals. Don't you mind Miss Nina was reading dat ar de very last Sunday she come to our place. Bress de Lord for sending her to us. I'se got heaps of good through dem readings.'

'Do you think we really shall see any?' said Fanny, with a little shade of apprehension in her voice. 'I don't know as I shall know how to speak to them.'

'Oh, angels is pleasant-spoken, well-meaning folks, allers,' said

Tiff, 'and don't take no offence at us. Of course, dey knows we ain't fetched up in dere ways, and dey don't 'spect it of us. It's my opinion,' said Tiff, 'that when folks is honest, and does de very best dey can, dey don't need to be 'fraid to speak to angels, nor nobody else, because you see we speaks to de Lord our selves when we prays; and bress de Lord, He don't take it ill of us, no ways; and now its borne in strong on my mind, dat de Lord is going to lead us through de wilderness, and bring us to good luck. Now, you see I'se going to follow de star, like de wise men did.'

While they were talking, they were making their way through dense woods in the direction of the swamp, every moment taking them deeper and deeper into the tangled brush and underwood. The children were accustomed to wander for hours through the woods, and, animated by the idea of having escaped their persecutors, followed Tiff with alacrity, as he went before them, clearing away the brambles and vines with his long arms, every once in a while wading with them across a bit of morass, or climbing his way through the branches of some uprooted tree. It was past ten o'clock at night when they started; it was now after midnight. Tiff had held on his course in the direction of the swamp, where he knew many fugitives were concealed, and he was not without hopes of coming upon some camp or settlement of them. About one o'clock they emerged from the more tangled brushwood, and stood on a slight little clearing, where a grape-vine, depending in natural festoons from a sweet gum-tree, made a kind of arbor. The moon was shining very full and calm, and the little breeze fluttered the grape-leaves, casting the shadow of some on the transparent greenness of others. The dew had fallen so heavily on that moist region, that every once in a while, as a slight wind agitated the leaves, it might be heard pattering from one to another like rain-drops. Teddy had long been complaining bitterly of fatigue. Tiff now sat down under this arbor, and took him fondly into his arms.

'Sit down, Miss Fanny;—and is Tiff's brave little man got tired? Well, he shall go to sleep, that he shall; we'se got out a good bit now I reckon, dey won't find us. We'se out here with de good Lord's works, and dey won't none on 'em tell on us. So now hush, my poor little man—shut up your eyes.' Tiff quavered the immortal cradle hymn—

'Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed;
Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.'

In a few moments Teddy was sound asleep; and Tiff, wrapping him in his white great coat, laid him down at the root of a tree.

'Bress the Lord, dere's no whiskey here,' he said, 'nor no drunken critturs to wake him up, and now, Miss Fanny, poor child, your eyes is a falling. Here's dis yere old shawl, I put up in de pocket of my coat—wrap it round you whilst I scrape up a heap of dem pine leaves yonder. Dem is reckoned mighty good for sleeping on, 'cause dey so healthy kinder. Dar you see, I'se got a desperate big heap of dem.'

'I'm tired, but I'm not sleepy,' said Fanny; 'but, Tiff, what are you going to do?'

'Do!' said Tiff, laughing with somewhat of his old joyous laugh; 'ho, ho, ho, I'se going to sit up for to meditate—a 'side-rin on de fowls of de air and de lilies in de field, and all dem dat Miss Nina used to read about.'

For many weeks Fanny's bed-chamber had been the hot dusty loft of the cabin, with the heated roof just above her head, and the noise of bacchanalian revels below; now she lay sunk down among the soft and fragrant pine-foliage, and looked up watching the checkered roof of vine-leaves above her head, listening to the still patter of falling dew-drops and the tremulous whirr and flutter of leaves. Sometimes the soft night-winds swayed the tops of the pines with a long swell of dashing murmurs, like the breaking of a tide on a distant beach. The moonlight, as it came sliding down through the checkered leafy roof, threw fragments and gleams of light, which moved capriciously here and there over the ground, revealing now a great silvery fern-leaf, and then a tuft of white flowers, gilding spots on the branches and trunks of the trees; while every moment the deeper shadows were lighted up by the gleaming of fire-flies. The child would raise her head awhile, and look on the still scene around, and then sink on her fragrant pillow in dreamy delight. Everything was so still, so calm, so pure, no wonder she was prepared to believe that the angels of the Lord were to be found in the wilderness.

They who have walked in closest communion with nature have ever found that they have not departed thence. The wilderness and solitary places are still glad, for they and their presence makes the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose. When Fanny and Teddy were both asleep, old Tiff knelt down and addressed himself to his prayers; and though he had neither prayer-book nor cushion, nor formula, his words went right to the mark in the best English he could command for any occasion; and so near as we could collect from the sound of his words, Tiff's prayer ran as follows:—

'Oh, good Lord, now please do look down on dese yere chil'en. I started them out as you tells me, and now where we is to go, and where we is to get any breakfast, I'm sure I don't know. But oh, good Lord, you has got everything in de world in your hands, and its mighty easy for you to be helping on us, and I has faith to believe dat you will. Oh, blessed Lord Jesus, that was carried off into Egypt for fear of the King Herod, do pray look down on dese yere poor chil'en, for I'm sure dat ar woman is as bad as Herod any day. Good Lord, you have seen how she has been treating on them, and now do pray open a way for us through de wilderness to de promised land. Everlasting—Amen.'

The last two words Tiff always added to all his prayers from a sort of sense of propriety, feeling as if they rounded off the prayer, and made it, as he would have phrased it, something more like a white prayer. We have only to say to those who question concerning this manner of prayer, that if they will examine the supplications of patriarchs of ancient times, they will find that, with the exception of the broken English and bad grammar, they were in substance very much like this of Tiff.

The Bible divides men into two classes, those who trust in themselves, and those who trust in God. The one class walk by their own light, trust in their own strength, fight their own battles, and have no confidence otherwise. The other, not neglecting to use the wisdom and strength which God has given them, still trust in His wisdom and His strength to carry out the weakness of theirs. The one class go through life as orphans, the other have a Father. Tiff's prayer had at least this recommendation, that he felt perfectly sure that something was to come of it. Had he not told the Lord all about it? Certainly he had, and of course he would be helped. And this confidence Tiff took, as Jacob did a stone for his pillow, as he lay down between his children and slept soundly.

How innocent, soft, and kind are all God's works! From the silent shadows of the forest—the tender and loving presence which our sin exiled from the haunts of men hath not yet departed. Sweet fall the moonbeams through the dewy leaves, peaceful is the breeze that waves the branches of the pines, merciful and tender the little wind that shakes the small flowers and tremulous wood-grasses fluttering over the heads of the motherless children. Oh, thou who bearest in thee a heart hot and weary, sick and faint with the vain tumults and confusions of the haunts of men, go to the wilderness and thou shalt find Him there, who saith 'As one whom his mother comforteth so will I comfort you.' 'I will be as the dew to Israel.—He shall grow as a lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon.'

Well, they slept there quietly all night long. Between three and four o'clock an oriole who had his habitation in the vine above their heads, began a gentle twittering conversation with some of his neighbours; not a loud song, I would give you to understand, but a little low inquiry as to what o'clock it was; and then if you had been in the still wood at that time, you might have heard through all the trees of pine, beach, and holly, sweet gum and larch, a little tremulous stir and flutter of birds awaking and stretching their wings—little eyes were opening in a thousand climbing vines where soft feathery habitants had hung swinging breezily all night—low twitterings and chirpings were heard, then a loud clear echoing chorus of harmony answering from tree to tree, jubilant and joyous as if there never had been a morning before. The morning star had not yet gone down—nor were the purple curtains of the east undrawn, and the moon, which had been shining full all night, still stood like a patient late burning light in a quiet chamber. It is not everybody that wakes to hear this first chorus of the birds; they who sleep till sunrise have lost it, and with it a thousand mysterious pleasures—strange sweet communings, which like morning dew begin to evaporate when the sun rises.

But though Tiff and the children slept all night, we are under no obligations to keep our eyes shut to the fact that between three and four o'clock there came crackling through the swamps the dark figure of one whose journeyings were more often by night than by day. Dred had been out on one of his nightly excursions, carrying game which he disposed of for powder and shot at one of the low stores we have alluded to. He came unexpectedly on the sleepers while making his way back. His first movement on seeing them was that of surprise, then stoop ing and examining the group more closely, he appeared to recognize them. Dred had known old Tiff before, and had occasion to go to him more than once to beg supplies for fugitives in the swamps, or to get some errand performed which he could not himself venture abroad to attend to. Like others of his race, Tiff, on all such subjects, was so habitually and unfathomably secret, that the children who knew him most intimately, had never received even a suggestion from him of the existence of any such person.

Dred, whose eyes, sharpened by habitual caution, never lost sight of any change in his vicinity, had been observant of that which had taken place in old Tiff's affairs. When, therefore, he saw him sleeping as we have described, he understood the whole matter at once. He looked at the children, as they lay nestled at the roots of the trees, with something of a softened expression, muttering to himself—

‘They embrace the rock for shelter.’

He opened a pouch which he wore on his side, and took from thence one or two corn dodgers and half a broiled rabbit, which his wife had put up for hunting provision the day before, and laying them down on the leaves, hastened on to a place where he intended to surprise some game in the morning.

The chorus of birds we have before described, awakened old Tiff, accustomed to habits of early rising. He sat up and begun rubbing his eyes and stretching himself. He had slept well. For his habits of life had not been such as to make him at all fastidious with regard to his couch.

‘Well!’ he said to himself, ‘any way dat ar woman won’ get des yer chil’en dis yer day,’ and he gave one of his old hearty laughs to think how nicely he had outwitted her.

‘Laws!’ he said to himself, ‘don’t I hear her now, “Tiff, Tiff, Tiff!” she says. Holla away, old Mist’, Tiff don’t hear yer; no, nor de chil’en neither, por blessed lambs!’

Here, in turning to the children, his eye fell on the provisions. At first he stood petrified, with his hands lifted in astonishment: had the angel been there, sure enough? he thought.

‘Well, now, bress de Lord, sure enough here’s de very breakfast I was asking for last night. Well, I know’d de Lord would do somethin’ for us, but I really didn’t know as ’twould come so quick. Maybe de ravens brought it, as dey did to ’Lijah—bread and flesh in de mornin’, and bread and flesh at night; well, dis yer’s ’couragin’, ’tis so. I won’t wake up de por little lambs, let dem sleep; dey'll be mighty tickled when dey come for to see de breakfast. And den out here it's so sweet and clean; none yer nasty bacca spittins o' folks dat doesn't know how to be decent. Bress me, I'se rather tired myself; I 'spects I'd better camp down again till de chil'en wakes. Dat ar critter's kep me gwine till I'se got pretty stiff, with her contrary ways, 'spects she'll be as troubled as king Herod was now, and all 'Rusalein with her.'

And Tiff rolled and laughed quietly in the security of his heart.

'I say, Tiff, where are we?' said a little voice at his side.

'Where is we, puppet?' said Tiff, turning over. 'Why, bress ye sweet eyes, how does yes do dis mornin? Streach away, my man, nebber be afraid, we's in de Lord's diggins now, all safe, and de angel's got a breakfast ready for us, too,' said Tiff, displaying the provision, which he had arranged on some vine leaves.

'Oh, uncle Tiff! did the angels bring that?' said Teddy. 'Why didn't you wake me up? I wanted to see them. I never saw an angel in all my life.'

'Nor I neither, honey, dey comes mostly when we's asleep; but stay, dars Miss Fanny a wakin' up. How is yer, lamb? is yer 'freshed?'

'Oh, uncle Tiff, I've slept so sound!' said Fanny; 'and I dreamed such a beautiful dream.'

'Well, then, tell it right off 'fore breakfast,' said Tiff, 'to make it come true.'

'Well,' said Fanny, 'I dreamed I was in a desolate place, where I couldn't get out, all full of rocks and brambles, and Teddy was with me; and while we were trying and trying, our ma came to us; she looked like our ma, only a great deal more beautiful, and she had a strange white dress on that shone and hung clear to her feet, and she took hold of our hands, and the rocks opened, and we walked through a path into a beautiful green meadow full of lilies and wild strawberries, and then she was gone.'

'Well,' said Teddy, 'maybe 'twas she who brought some breakfast for us. See here, what we've got!'

Fanny looked surprised and pleased; but, after some consideration, said—

'I don't believe mamma brought that; I don't believe they have cornuke and roast meat in heaven; if it had been mauna, now, it would have been more likely.'

'Never mind whar it comes from,' said Tiff; 'it's right good, and we bress de Lord for it.'

And they sat down accordingly and ate their breakfast, with a good heart.

'Now,' said Tiff, 'somewhar round in dis swamp dere's a camp of de coloured people, but I don't know rightly whar 'tis. If we could get to dem, we could stay dar awhile, till somthin or nuthur should turn up. Hark! what's dat ar?'

It was the crack of a rifle reverberating through the dewy leafy stillness of the forest.

'Dat ar ain't far off,' said Tiff.

The children looked a little terrified.

'Don't yer be 'fraid,' he said; 'I wouldn't wonder but I knowed who dat ar was. Hark, now, to somebody comin dis yer way.'

A clear exultant voice sang through the leafy distance—

'Oh! had I the wings of the morning,
I'd fly away to Canaan's shore.'

'Yes,' said Tiff to himself, 'dat ar's his voice. Now, chil'en,' he said, 'dar's somebody comin, and you mustn't be 'fraid on him, 'cause I 'specs he'll get us to dat ar camp I'se tellin about.'

And Tiff in a cracked and strained voice, which contrasted oddly enough with the bell-like tones of the distant singer, commenced singing a part of an old song, which might perhaps have been used as a signal—

'Hailing so stormingly,
Cold stormy weather;
I want my true love all de day;
When shall I find him? when shall I find him?'

The distant singer stopped his song, apparently to listen; and while Tiff kept on singing they could hear the crackling of approaching footsteps. At last Dred emerged to view.

'So you've fled to the wilderness!' he said.

'Yes, yes!' said Tiff, with a kind of giggle, 'we had to come to it. Dat ar woman was so aggravatin' on de chil'en; of all de pizin critters dat I knows on, des yer mean white women is the piziness. Dey ain't got no manners and no bringing up; dey doesn't begin to know how things ought for to be done 'mong 'spectable people, so we just tuck to de bush.'

'You might have taken to a worse place,' said Dred. 'The Lord God giveth grace and glory to the trees of the wood, and the time will come when the Lord will make a covenant of peace, and cause the evil beast to cease out of the land, and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and shall sleep in the woods, and the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and they shall be safe in the land; when the Lord hath broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hands of those that served themselves of them.'

'And you tink dem good times coming, sure enough,' said Tiff.

'The Lord hath said it,' said the other; 'but first the day of vengeance must come.'

'I don't want no sich,' said Tiff: 'I want to live peaceable.'

Dred looked upon Tiff with an air of acquiescent pity, which had in it a slight shade of contempt, and said as if in soliloquy—

'Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens, and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant, and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.'

'As to rest,' said Tiff, 'de Lord knows I ain't had much of dat if I be an ass; if I had a good strong pack-saddle I'd like to trot des yer chil'en out in some good cleared place.'

'Well,' said Dred, 'you have served him that was ready to perish, and not betrayed him who wandered, therefore the Lord will open for you a fenced city in the wilderness.'

'Just so,' said Tiff, 'dat ar camp o' yours is just what I'm arter; I'se willing to lend a hand to most anything that's good.'

'Well,' said Dred, 'the children are too tender to walk where we must go, so we must bear them as an eagle beareth her young. Come, my little man,'—and as Dred spoke he stooped down and stretched out his hands to Teddy. His severe and gloomy countenance relaxed into a smile, and to Tiff's surprise the child went immediately to him, and allowed him to lift him in his arms.

'Now, I'd thought he'd been skeared of you,' said Tiff.

'Not he; I never saw a child or dog that I couldnt make come to me. Hold fast now, my little man,' he said, seating the boy on his shoulder, 'trees have long arms, don't let them rake you off. Now, Tiff,' he said, 'you take the girl and come after, and when we come into the thick of the swamp, mind you step right n my tracks; mind you don't set your foot on a tussck, if I haven't set mine there before you, because the moccassins lie on he tusscks.' And thus saying, Dred and his companion began making their way toward the fugitive camp.

CHAPTER XLI.

A CLERICAL CONFERENCE.

A FEW days found Clayton in the city of —, guest of the Rev. Dr. Cushing. He was a man in the middle life—of fine personal presence, urbane, courtly, gentlemanly. Dr. Cushing was a popular and much-admired clergyman, standing high among his brethren in the ministry, and almost the idol of a large and flourishing church. He was a man of warm feelings, humane impulses, and fine social qualities. His sermons, beautifully written and delivered with great fervour, often drew tears from the eyes of the hearers. His pastoral ministrations, whether at weddings or funerals, had a peculiar tenderness and unction. None was more capable than he of celebrating the holy fervour and self-denying sufferings of apostles and martyrs; none more easily kindled by those devout hymns which describe the patience of the saints; but with all this, for any practical emergency, Dr. Cushing was nothing of a soldier. There was a species of moral effeminacy about him, and the very luxuriant softness and richness of his nature unfitted him to endure hardness. He was known in all his intercourse with his brethren as a peace-maker—a modifier and harmoniser. Nor did he scrupulously examine how much of the credit of this was due to a fastidious softness of nature, which made controversy disagreeable and wearisome. Nevertheless Clayton was at first charmed with the sympathetic warmth with which he and his plans were received by his relative. He seemed perfectly to agree with Clayton in all his views of the terrible evils of the slave system, and was prompt with anecdotes and instances to enforce everything that he said. ‘Clayton was just in time,’ he said; ‘a number of his ministerial brethren were coming to-morrow, some of them from the northern states. Clayton should present his views to them.’

Dr. Cushing’s establishment was conducted on the footing of the most liberal hospitality, and that very evening the domestic circle was made larger by the addition of four or five ministerial brethren. Among these Clayton was glad to meet once more, father Dickson. The serene good man seemed to bring the blessing of the gospel of peace with him wherever he went. Among others was one whom we will more particularly introduce, the Rev. Shubael Packthread. Dr. Shubael Packthread was a minister of a leading church in one of the northern cities. Constitutionally he was an amiable and kindly man, with very fair natural abilities, fairly improved by culture. Long habits, however, of theological and ecclesiastical controversy had cultivated a certain species of acuteness of mind into such disproportioned activity, that other parts of his intellectual and moral nature had been dwarfed and dwindled beside it. What might, under other circumstances, have been agreeable and useful tact, became in him a constant and life-long habit of stratagem. While other people look upon words as vehicles for conveying ideas, Dr. Packthread regarded them only as mediums for concealment. His constant study on every controverted topic was so to adjust language that, with the appearance of the utmost precision, it should always be capable of a double interpretation. He was a cunning master of all forms of indirection—of all phrases by which people appear to say what they do not say, and not to say what they do say. He was an adept also in all the mechanism of ecclesiastical debate, of the intricate labyrinths of heresy-hunting, of every scheme by which more simple and less-advised brethren speaking with ignorant sincerity could be entrapped and deceived. He was au fait also in all compromise measures, in which two parties unite in one form of words, meaning by them exactly opposite ideas, and call the agreement a union. He was also expert in all those parliamentary modes in synod or general assembly by which troublesome discussions should be avoided or disposed of, and credulous brethren made to believe they had gained points which they had not gained—by which discussions could be at will blinded with dusty clouds of misrepresentation, or trailed on through interminable marshes of weariness to accomplish some manœuvre of ecclesiastical tactics.

Dr. Packthread also was master of every means by which the influence of opposing parties might be broken. He could spread a convenient report on necessary occasions by any of those forms which do not assert, but which disseminate a slander quite as certainly as if they did. If it was necessary to create a suspicion of the orthodoxy, or of the piety or even of the morality of an opposing brother, Dr. Packthread understood how to do it in the neatest and most tasteful manner. He was an infallible judge whether it should be accomplished by innocent interrogations, or as to whether you had heard ‘so and so of Mr. —,’ or by ‘charitably expressed hopes that you had not heard so and so,’ or by gentle suggestions whether it would not be as well to inquire, or by shakes of the head and lifts of the eyes at proper intervals in conversation, or lastly by silence when silence became the strongest as well as safest form of assertion.

In person he was tall, thin, and the lines of his face appeared, every one of them, to be engraved by caution and care. In his boyhood and youth the man had had a trick of smiling and laughing without considering why; the grace of prudence, however, had corrected all this. He never did either in these days without understanding precisely what he was about. His face was a part of his stock in trade, and he understood the management of it remarkably well. He knew precisely all the gradations of smile which were useful for accomplishing different purposes; the solemn smile, the smile of inquiry, the smile affirmative, the smile suggestive, the smile of incredulity, and the smile of innocent credulity, which encouraged the simple-hearted narrator to go on unfolding himself to the brother who sat quietly behind his face as a spider does behind his web, waiting till his unsuspecting friend had tangled himself in incautious, impulsive, and of course contradictory meshes of statement, which were, in some future hour, in the most gentle and Christian spirit to be tightened around the incautious captive, while as much blood was sucked as the good of the cause demanded.

It is not to be supposed that the Rev. Dr. Packthread, so skilful and adroit as we have represented him, failed in the necessary climax of such skill—that of deceiving himself. Far from it. Truly and honestly Dr. Packthread thought himself one of the hundred forty and four thousand who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, in whose mouth is found no guile. Prudence he considered the chief of Christian graces. He worshipped Christian prudence, and the whole category of accomplishments which we have described he considered as the fruits of it. His prudence, in fact, served him all the purposes that the stock of the tree did to the ancient idolater:—‘With part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast, and is satisfied: yea, he warmeth himself, and saith, Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire. And the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image: he falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, Deliver me; for thou art my god.’

No doubt Dr. Packthread expected to enter heaven by the same judicious management by which he had lived on earth; and thus he went on from year to year, doing deeds which even a political candidate would blush at, violating the most ordinary principles of morality and honour; while he sung hymns, made prayers, administered sacraments; expecting, no doubt, at last to enter heaven by some neat arrangement of words used in two senses.

Dr. Packthread's cautious agreeableness of manner formed a striking contrast to the innocent and almost childlike simplicity with which father Dickson, in his threadbare coat, appeared at his side. Almost as poor in this world's goods as his Master, father Dickson's dwelling had been a simple one-story cottage, in all, save thrift and neatness, very little better than those of the poorest; and it was a rare year when a hundred dollars passed through his hand. He had seen the time when he had not even wherewithal to take from the office a necessary letter. He had seen his wife suffer for medicine and comforts in sickness. He had himself ridden without overcoat in the chill months of winter. But all these things he had borne as the traveller bears a storm on the way to his home; and it was beautiful to see the unenvying, frank, simple pleasure which he seemed to feel in the elegant and abundant home of his brother, and in the thousand appliances of hospitable comfort by which he was surrounded. The spirit within us that lusteth to envy had been chased from his bosom by the expulsive force of a higher love, and his simple and unstudied acts of constant good will, showed that simple Christianity can make the gentleman. Father Dickson was regarded by his ministerial brethren with great affection and veneration, though wholly devoid of any ecclesiastical wisdom. They were fond of using him much as they did their hymn-books and Testaments—for their better hours of devotion; and equally apt to let slip his admonitions when they came to the hard matter-of-fact business of ecclesiastical discussion and management. Yet they loved well to have him with them, as they felt that, like a psalm or a text, his presence in some sort gave sanction to what they did.

In due time there was added to the number of the circle our joyous out-spoken friend father Bonnie, fresh from a recent series of camp-meetings in a distant part of the state, and ready at a minute's notice for either a laugh or a prayer. Very little of the stereotype print of his profession had he, the sort of wild woodland freedom of his life giving to his manners and conversations a tone of sylvan roughness of which Dr. Packthread evidently stood in considerable doubt. Father Bonnie's early training had been that of what is called in common parlance 'a self-made man.'

He was unsophisticated by Greek or Latin, had rather a contempt for the forms of the schools, and a joyous determination to say what he pleased on all occasions.

There were also present one or two of the leading Presbyterian ministers of the north; they had, in fact, come for a private and confidential conversation with Dr. Cushing, concerning the reunion of the new school Presbyterian Church with the old. It may be necessary to apprise some of our readers not conversant with American ecclesiastical history, that the Presbyterian Church of America is divided into two parties, in relation to certain theological points, and that the adherents on either side call themselves old and new school. Some years since these two parties divided, and each of them organised its own general assembly.

It so happened that all the slave-holding interest, with some very inconsiderable exceptions, went into the old school body. The great majority of the new school body were avowedly anti-slavery men, according to a solemn declaration which committed the whole Presbyterian Church to those sentiments in the year 1818. And the breach between the two sections was caused quite as much by the difference of feeling between the northern and southern branches on the subject of slavery as by any differences of doctrine.

After the first jar of separation was over, thoughts of reunion began to arise on both sides, and to be quietly discussed among leading minds. There is a power in men of a certain class of making an organisation of any kind, whether it be political or ecclesiastical, an object of absorbing and individual devotion. Most men feel empty and insufficient of themselves, and find a need to ballast their own insufficiency by attaching themselves to something of more weight than they are. They put their small stock of being out at interest, and invest themselves somewhere and in something, and the love of wife or child is not more absorbing than the love of the bank where the man has invested himself. It is true, this power is a noble one, because thus a man may pass out of self and choose God, the great good of all, for his portion. But human weakness falls below this, and, as the idolater worships the infinite and unseen under a visible symbol till it effaces the memory of what is signified by it, so men begin by loving institutions for God's sake, which come at last to stand with them in the place of God.

Such was the Rev. Dr. Calker. He was a man of powerful though narrow mind, of great energy and efficiency, and of that capability of abstract devotion which makes the soldier or the statesman. He was earnestly and sincerely devout, as he understood devotion. He began with loving the Church for God's sake, and ended with loving her better than God, and by the Church he meant the organisation of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. Her cause in his eyes was God's cause. Her glory, God's glory. Her success, the indispensable condition of the millennium. Her defeat, the defeat of all that was good for the human race. His devotion to her was honest and unselfish.

Of course Dr. Calker estimated all interests by their influence on the Presbyterian Church. He weighed every cause in the balance of her sanctuary. What promised extension and power to her, that he supported. What threatened defeat or impediment, that he was ready to sacrifice. He would at any day sacrifice himself, and all his interests, to that cause, and he felt equally willing to sacrifice others and their interests. The anti-slavery cause he regarded with a simple eye to this question. It was a disturbing force, weakening the harmony among brethren; threatening disruption and disunion. He regarded it, therefore, with distrust and aversion. He would read no facts on that side of the question, and when the discussions of zealous brethren would bring frightful and appalling statements into the General Assembly, he was too busy in seeking what could be said to ward off their force, to allow them to have much influence on his own mind. Gradually he came to view the whole subject with dislike, as a pertinacious intruder in the path of the Presbyterian Church. That the whole train of cars, laden with the interests of the world for all time, should be stopped by a ragged manacled slave across the track, was to him an impertinence and absurdity. What was he that the Presbyterian Church should be divided and hindered for him? So thought the exultant thousands who followed Christ once, when the blind beggar raised his importunate clamor; and they would make him hold his peace. So thought not HE, who stopped the tide of triumphant success, that he might call the neglected one to himself, and lay his hands upon him.

Dr. Calker had, from year to year, opposed the agitation of the slavery question in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, knowing well that it threatened disunion. When, in spite of all his efforts, disunion came, he bent his energies to the task of reuniting, and he was the most important character in the present caucus.

Of course a layman, and a young man also, would feel some natural hesitancy in joining at once in the conversation of those older than himself. Clayton therefore sat at the hospitable breakfast-table of Dr. Cushing rather as an auditor than as a speaker.

'Now, brother Cushing,' said Dr. Calker, 'the fact is, there never was any need of this disruption. It has crippled the power of the Church, and given the enemy occasion to speak reproachfully. Our divisions are playing right into the hands of the Methodists and Baptists; and ground that we might hold united, is going into their hands every year.'

'I know it,' said Dr. Cushing, 'and we southern brethren mourn over it, I assure you. The fact is, brother Calker, there's no such doctrinal division after all. Why, there are brethren among us that are of as new school as Dr. Draper, and we don't meddle with them.'

'Just so,' replied Dr. Calker, 'and we have true-blue old school men among us.'

'I think,' said Dr. Packthread, 'that with suitable care a document might be drawn up which will meet the views on both sides. You see we must get the extreme men on both sides to agree to hold still. Why, now, I am called new school; but I wrote a set of definitions once, which I showed to Dr. Pyke, who is as sharp as anybody on the other side, and he said he agreed with them entirely. Those N — H — men are incautious.'

'Yes,' said Dr. Calker, 'and it's just dividing the resources and the influence of the Church for nothing. Now, those discussions as to the time when moral agency begins are, after all, of no great account in practical workings.'

'Well,' said Dr. Cushing, 'it's nothing but the radical tone of some of your abolition fanatics that stands in the way. These slavery discussions in General Assembly have been very disagreeable and painful to our people, particularly those of western brethren. They don't understand us—nor the delicacy of our position. They don't know that we need to be let alone, in order to effect anything. Now I am for trusting to the softening, meliorating, influences of the Gospel. The kingdom of God cometh not with observation. I trust that in His mysterious providence the Lord will see fit, in his own good time, to remove this evil of slavery. Meanwhile brethren ought to possess their souls in patience.'

'Brother Cushing,' said father Dickson, 'since the Assembly of eighteen hundred and eighteen, the number of slaves has increased in this country fourfold. New slave states have been added, and a great regular system of breeding and trading organized, which is filling all our large cities with trading-houses. The ships of our ports go out as slavers, carrying loads of miserable creatures down to New Orleans, and there is a constant increase of this traffic through the country. This very summer I was at the death-bed of a poor girl, only seventeen or eighteen, who had been torn from all her friends, and sent off with a coffin, and she died there in the wilderness. It does seem to me, brother Cushing, that this silent plan does not answer. We are not half as near to emancipation apparently as we were in eighteen hundred and eighteen.'

'Has there ever been any attempt,' said Clayton, 'among the Christians of your denominations to put a stop to this internal slave-trade?'

'Well,' said Dr. Cushing, 'I don't know that there has, any farther than general preaching against injustice.'

'Have you ever made any movement in the Church, to prevent the separation of families?' said Clayton.

'No, not exactly; we leave that thing to the conscience of individuals. The synods have always enjoined it on professors of religion, to treat their servants according to the spirit of the gospel.'

'Has the Church ever endeavoured to influence the legislature to allow general education?' said Clayton.

'No, that subject is fraught with difficulties,' said Dr. Cushing. 'The fact is, if these rabid northern abolitionists would let us alone, we might perhaps make a movement on some of these subjects; but they excite the minds of our people, and get them into such a state of inflammation, that we cannot do anything.'

During all the time that father Dickson and Clayton had been speaking, Dr. Calker had been making minutes with a pencil on a small piece of paper for future use. It was always disagreeable to him to hear of slave-coffins, and the internal slave-trade; and therefore, when anything was ever said on these topics, he would generally busy himself in some other way than listening. Father Dickson, he had known of old, as being remarkably pertinacious on those subjects, and therefore, when he began to speak, he took the opportunity of jotting down a few ideas for a future exigency.

He now looked up from his paper, and spoke—

‘Oh, those fellows are without any reason, perfectly wild and crazy. They are monomaniacs—they cannot see but one subject anywhere. Now, there’s father Ruskin of Ohio. There’s nothing can be done with that man. I have had him at my house hours and hours, talking to him, and laying it all down before him, and showing him what great interests he was compromising; but it didn’t do a bit of good. He just harps on one eternal string. Now, it’s all the pushing and driving of these fellows in the General Assembly that made the division, in my opinion.’

‘We kept it off a good many years,’ said Dr. Packthread, ‘and it took all our ingenuity to do it, I assure you. Now, ever since eighteen hundred and thirty-five, these fellows have been pushing and crowding in every Assembly, and we have stood faithfully in our lot, to keep the Assembly from doing anything which could give offence to our southern brethren. We have always been particular to put them forward in our public services, and to show them every imaginable deference. I think our brethren ought to consider how hard we have worked. We had to be instant in season and out of season, I can tell you. I think I may claim some little merit,’ continued the doctor, with a cautious smile spreading over his face. ‘If I have any talent, it is a capacity for the judicious use of language. Now, sometimes, brethren will wrangle a whole day, till they all get tired and sick of the subject, and then, just let a man who understands the use of terms step in, and sometimes, by omitting a single word, he will alter the whole face of an affair.’

‘I remember, one year, those fellows were driving us up to make some sort of declaration about slavery, and we really had to do it, because it wouldn’t do to have the west split off, and there was a three days’ fight, till finally we got the thing pared down to the lowest terms. We thought we would pass a resolution that slavery was a moral evil, if the southern brethren liked that better than the old way of calling it a sin, and we really were getting on quite harmoniously, when some of the southern ultras took it up, and they said that moral evil meant the same as sin, and that would imply a censure on the brethren. Well, it got late, and some of the hottest ones were tired, and had gone off, and I just quietly drew my pen across the word moral, and read the resolution, and it went unanimously. Most ministers, you see, are willing to call slavery an evil; the trouble lay in that word moral. Well, that capped the crater for that year. But then they were at it again the very next time they came together, for those fellows never sleep.

‘ Well, then we took a new turn. I told the brethren we had better get it on to the ground of the reserved rights of Presbyteries and Synods, and decline interfering. Well, then, that was going very well, but some of the brethren very injudiciously got up a resolution in the Assembly, recommending disciplinary measures for dancing. That was passed without much thought, because, you know, there’s no great interest involved in dancing, and of course there’s nobody to oppose such a resolution; but then it was very injudicious, under the circumstances, for the abolitionists made a handle of it immediately, and wanted to know why we couldn’t as well recommend a discipline for slavery, because, you see, dancing isn’t a sin per se, any more than slavery is, and they haven’t done blowing their trumpets over us to this day.’

Here the company rose from breakfast, and, according to the good old devout custom, seated themselves for family worship. Two decent, well-dressed black women, were called in, and also a negro man. At father Dickson’s request, all united in singing the following hymn :—

‘ Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb;
And shall I fear to own his cause,
Or blush to speak his name?

‘ Must I be carried to the skies,
On flowery beds of ease,
Whilst others fight to win the prize,
Or sail thro’ bloody seas?

‘ Sure I must fight, if I would reign:
Increase my courage, Lord;
I’ll bear the cross, endure the shame,
Supported by thy word.

‘ The saints, in all this glorious war
Shall conquer, tho’ they die;
They see the victory from afar
With faith’s discerning eye.

‘ When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all thine army shine
In robes of victory thro’ the skies,
The glory shall be thine.’

Anybody who had seen the fervour with which these brethren now united in singing these stanzas, might have supposed them a company of the primitive martyrs and confessors, who, having drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, were now ready for a millennial charge on the devil and all his works.

None sang with more heartiness than Dr. Packthread, for his natural feelings were quick and easily excited, nor did he dream he was not a soldier of the cross, and that the species of skirmishes he had been describing were not all in accordance with the spirit of the hymn. Had you interrogated him, he would have shown you a syllogistic connexion between the glory of God, and the best good of the universe, and the course he had been pursuing. So that if father Dickson had supposed the hymn would act as a gentle suggestion, he was very much mistaken. As to Doctor Calker, he joined with enthusiasm, applying it all the while to the enemies of the Presbyterian Church, in the same manner as Ignatius Loyola might have sung it, applying it to Protestantism. Dr. Cushing considered the conflict described as wholly an internal one, and thus all joined alike in swelling the chorus—

‘A soldier for Jesus—
Hallelujah!
Love and serve the Lord.’

Father Dickson read from the Bible as follows:—

“Our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our consciences, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God we have our conversation in the world.”

Father Dickson had many gentle and quiet ways, peculiar to himself, of suggesting his own views to his brethren. Therefore, having read these verses, he paused, and asked Dr. Packthread if he did not think there was danger of departing from this spirit, and losing the simplicity of Christ, when we conduct Christian business on worldly principle.

Doctor Packthread cordially assented, and continued to the same purpose in a strain so edifying, as entirely to exhaust the subject; and Dr. Calker, who was thinking of the business that was before them, giving an uneasy motion here, they immediately united in the devotional exercises, which were led with great fervour by Dr. Cushing.

CHAPTER XLII

THE RESULT.

AFTER the devotional services were over, Dr. Calker proceeded immediately with the business that he had in his mind. 'Now, brother Cushing,' he said, 'there never was any instrumentality raised up by Providence to bring in the latter day equal to the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; it is the great hope of the world, for here in this country we are trying the great experiments for all ages, and undoubtedly the Presbyterian Church comes the nearest to perfection of any form of organisation possible to our frail humanity. It is the ark of the covenant for this nation and for all nations—missionary enterprises to foreign countries—Tract Societies—Home Missionary—Seamen's Friends' Societies—Bible Societies—Sunday-school Unions—all are embraced in its bosom, and it grows in a free country, planted by God's own right hand, with such laws and institutions as never were given to mortal man before. It is carrying us right on to the millennium; and all we want is union: united we stand the most glorious—the most powerful—institution in the world. Now, there was no need for you southern brethren to be so restive as you were. We were doing all we could to keep down the fire and keep things quiet, and you ought not to have bolted so. Since you have separated from us, what have we done? I suppose you thought we were going to blaze out in a regular abolition fury, but you see we haven't done it. We haven't done any more than when we were united. Just look at our minutes and you'll see it. We have strong and determined abolitionists among us—and they are constantly urging and pushing. There have been great public excitements on the subject of slavery, and we have been plagued and teased to declare ourselves; but we haven't done it in a single instance, not one. You see that Ruskin and his clique have gone off from us, because we would hold still. It is true that now and then we had to let some anti-slavery man preach an opening sermon, or something of that sort; but then opening sermons are nothing; they don't commit anybody—they don't show the opinion of anybody but the speaker. In fact they don't express any more than that declaration of eighteen hundred and eighteen, which stands unrepealed on your records as well as on ours.

Of course we are all willing to say that slavery is an evil, "entirely inconsistent with the spirit of the Gospel," and all that, because that's on your own books; we only agree to say nothing about it now-a-days in our public capacity, because what was said in eighteen eighteen is all-sufficient, and prevents the odium and scandal of public controversy now. Now, for proof that what I have just said is true, look at the facts. We had three Presbyteries in slave-holding states when we started, and now we have over twenty—with from fifteen to twenty thousand members. That must show you what our hearts are on this subject. And have we not always been making overtures for reunion? really humbling ourselves to you brethren? Now I say you ought to take these facts into account. Our slave-holding members and churches are left as perfectly undisturbed to manage in their own way as yours. To be sure some of those western men will fire off a remonstrance once a year, or something of that sort. Just let them do that—it keeps them easy and contented. And so long as there is really no interfering in the way of discipline or control, what harm is done? You ought to bear with the northern brethren, unreasonable as they are—and we may well have a discussion every year to let off the steam.'

'For my part,' said father Bonnie, 'I want union I'm sure. I'd tar and feather those northern abolitionists if I could get them.'

'Figuratively, I suppose,' said Dr. Packthread, with a gentle smile.

'Yes, figuratively and literally too,' said father Bonnie, laughing; 'let them come down here and see what they'll get. If they will set the country in a blaze, they ought to be the first ones to be warmed at the fire. For my part, brethren, I must say that you lose time and strength by your admissions, all of you. You don't hit the buck in the eye. I thank the Lord that I am delivered from the bondage of thinking slavery a sin or an evil in any sense. Our abolitionist brethren have done one good thing—they have driven us up to examine the Scriptures, and there we find that slavery is not only permitted, but appointed, enjoined. It is a Divine institution. If a northern abolitionist comes at me now, I shake the Bible at him, and say, "Nay, but oh man! who art thou that repliest against God? Hath not the potter power over the clay to make one lump to honour and another to dishonour."—I tell you, brethren, it blazes from every page of the Scriptures. You'll never do anything till you get on to that ground. A man's conscience is always hanging on to his skirts; he goes on just like a bear with a trap on his leg—can't make any progress that way. You have got to get your feet on the Rock of Ages, I can tell you, and get the trap off your leg. There's nothing like the study of the Scriptures to clear a fellow's mind.'

'Well, then,' said Clayton, 'would it not be well to repeal the laws which forbid the slaves to learn to read, and put the Scriptures into their hands?—These laws are the cause of a great deal of misery and immorality among the slaves, and they furnish abolitionists with some of their strongest arguments.'

'Oh,' said father Bonnie, 'that will never do in the world. It will expose them to whole floods of abolition and incendiary documents, corrupt their minds, and make them discontented.'

'Well,' said Dr. Cushing, 'I have read Dr. Carne's book, and I must say that the scriptural argument lies, in my mind, on the other side.'

'Hang Dr. Carne's book!' said father Bonnie.

'Figuratively, I suppose,' said Dr. Packthread.

'Why Dr. Carne's much learning has made him mad,' said father Bonnie. 'I don't believe anything that can't be got out of a plain English Bible. When a fellow goes shuffling off in a Hebrew fog—in a Latin fog—or in a Greek fog, I say, "Ah, my boy—you are tree'd, you had better come down." Why, isn't it plain enough to any reader of the Bible how the apostles talked to the slaves? They didn't fill their heads with stuff about the rights of man. Now, see here, just at a venture,' he said, making a dive at a pocket Bible that lay on the table. 'Now just let me read you—'

"Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal."

'Shoo—shoo, that isn't the place I was thinkin' of,—it's here—'

"Servants, obey your masters."

'There's into them, you see. "Obey your masters that are in the flesh." Now these abolitionists won't even allow that we are masters.'

'Perhaps,' said Clayton, quietly, 'if the slaves could read they'd pay more attention to the first passage that you favoured us with.'

'Oh, likely,' said father Bonnie, 'because you see their interests naturally would lead them to pervert Scripture. If it wasn't for that perverting influence of self-love, I, for my part, would be willing enough to put the Scriptures into their hands.'

'I suppose,' said Clayton, 'there's no such danger in the case of us masters, is there?'

'I say,' said father Bonnie, not noticing the interruption, 'Cushing, you ought to read Fletcher's book; that book, sir, is a sweater, I can tell you. I sweat over it, I know; but it does up this Greek and Hebrew work thoroughly I promise you. Though I can't read Greek or Hebrew, I see there's heaps of it there. Why, he takes you clear back to the creation of the world, and drags you through all the history and literature of the old botherems of all ages; he comes it down on the fathers like forty. There's Chrysostom and Tertullian, and all the rest of those old cocks, and the old Greek philosophers besides, Plato and Aristotle, and all the rest of them; if a fellow wants learning, there he'll get it. I declare, I'd rather cut my way through the Dismal Swamp in dog-days; but I was determined to be thorough, so I off coat and went at it, and there's no mistake about it, Cushing, you must get the book. You'll feel so much better if you'll settle your mind on that point. I never allow myself to go trailing along with anything hanging by the gills. I am an out-and-outer; walk up to the captain's office and settle—that's what I say.'

'We shall all have ~~to~~ <sup>may be</sup> to do that one of these days,' said father Dickson; 'and ~~may be~~, we shall find it one thing to settle with the clerk and another to settle with the captain.'

'Well, brother Dickson, you needn't look at me with any of your solemn faces; I'm settled now.'

'For my part,' said Dr. Packthread, 'I think, instead of condemning slavery in the abstract, we ought to direct our attention to its abuses?'

'And what do you consider its abuses?' said Clayton.

'Why, the separation of families, for instance,' said Dr. Packthread, 'and the forbidding of education.'

'You think, then,' said Clayton, 'that the slave ought to have a legal right to his family?'

'Yes.'

'Of course he ought to have the legal means of maintaining it?'

'Yes.'

'Then, of course, he ought to be able to enter suit when this is violated, and to bear testimony in a court of justice.'

'Yes.'

‘And do you think that the master ought to give him what is just and equal in the way of wages?’

‘Certainly, in one shape or another,’ said Dr. Packthread.

‘And ought the slave to have the means of enforcing this right?’

‘Certainly.’

‘Then the slave ought to be able to hold property?’

‘Yes.’

‘And he should have the legal right to secure education if he desires it?’

‘Yes.’

‘Well,’ said Clayton, ‘when the slave has a legal existence and legal rights, can hold property and defend it, acquire education and protect his family relations, he ceases to be a slave, for slavery consists in the fact of legal incapacity for any of these things. It consists in making a man a dead inert substance in the hands of another; holding men pro nullis, pro mortuis. What you call reforming abuses is abolishing slavery. It is in this very way that I wish to seek its abolition, and I desire the aid of the Church and ministry in doing it. Now, Dr. Packthread, what efforts has the Church as yet made to reform these abuses of slavery?’

There was a silence of some minutes. At last Dr. Cushing replied, ‘There has been a good deal of effort made in oral religious instruction.’

‘Oh, yes,’ said father Bonnie, ‘our people have been at it with great zeal in our part of the country. I have a class myself that I have been instructing in the Assembly’s Catechism, in the oral way, and the synods have taken it up, and they are preaching the gospel to them and writing catechisms for them.’

‘But,’ said Clayton, ‘would it not be best to give them a legal ability to obey the Gospel? Is there any use in teaching them the sanctity of marriage unless you obtain for husbands and wives the legal right to live faithful to each other? It seems to me only cruelty to awaken conscience on that subject, without giving the protection and assistance of law.’

‘What he says is very true,’ said Dr. Cushing, with emphasis.

‘We ministers are called to feel the necessity of that with regard to our slave church members. You see we are obliged to preach unlimited obedience to masters, and yet—why it was only last week—a very excellent pious mulatto woman in my church came to me to know what she should do. Her master was determined she should live with him as a mistress, yet she has a husband on the place. How am I to advise her? The man is a very influential man, and capable of making a good deal of commotion; besides which, she will gain nothing by resistance but to be sold away to some other master who will do worse. Now this is a very trying case to a minister. I'm sure if anything could be done I'd be glad; but the fact is, the moment a person begins to move in the least to reform these abuses he is called an abolitionist, and the whole community is down on him at once. That's the state these northern fanatics have got us into.'

'Oh yes,' said Dr. Baskum, (a leading minister,) who had recently come in, 'besides a man can't do everything. We've got as much as we can stagger under on our shoulders now—we've got the building up of the Church to attend to. That's the great instrumentality which at last will set everything straight. We must do as the apostles did, confine ourselves to preaching the Gospel, and the Gospel will bring everything else in its train. The world can't be made over in a day. We must do one thing at a time. We can't afford just at present to tackle in with all our other difficulties the odium and misrepresentation of such a movement. The minute we begin to do anything which looks like restraining the rights of masters, the cry of Church and State and Abolition will be raised, and we shall be swamped.'

'But,' said father Dickson, 'isn't it the right way first to find out our duty and do it, and then leave the result to God. Ought we to take counsel of flesh and blood in matters like these?'

'Of course not,' said Dr. Packthread; 'but there is a wise way and an unwise way of doing things. We are to consider the times, and only undertake such works as the movements of Divine Providence seem to indicate. I don't wish to judge for brethren; a time may come when it will be their duty to show themselves openly on this subject, but in order to obtain a foot-hold for the influences of the Gospel to work on, it may be necessary to bear and forbear with many evils. Under the present state of things, I hope many of the slaves are becoming hopefully pious. Brethren seem to feel that education will be attended with dangers—probably it might. It would seem desirable to secure the family relations of the slaves, if it could be done without too much sacrifice of more important things. After all, the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ is not of this world. The apostles entered no public protest against the abuses of slavery, that we read of.'

'It strikes me,' said Clayton, 'that there is a difference between our position under a republican government, in which we vote for our legislators, and in fact make the laws ourselves, and have the admitted right to seek their repeal, and that of the apostles who were themselves slaves, and could do nothing about the laws. We make our own laws, and every one of us is responsible for any unjust law which we do not do our best to alter. We have the right to agitate, write, print, and speak and bring up the public mind to the point of reform, and therefore we are responsible if unjust laws are not repealed.'

'Well,' said father Dickson, 'God forgive me, that I have been so remiss in times past! henceforth whatever others may do, I will not confer with flesh and blood. But I will go forth and declare the word of the Lord plainly to this people, and show unto the house of Judah their transgression. And now I have one thing to say to our dear northern brethren: I mourn over the undecided course which they take. Brethren in slave states are beset with many temptations. The whole course of public opinion is against them. They need that their northern brethren should stand firm and hold up their hands. Alas! how different has been their course! Their apologies for this mighty sin have weakened us more than all things put together. Public opinion is going back. The Church is becoming corrupted. Ministers are drawn into connivance with deadly sin. Children and youth are being ruined by habits of early tyranny. Our land is full of slave prisons, and the poor trader, no man careth for his soul. Our poor whites are given up to ignorance and licentiousness; and our ministers, like our brother Bonnie here, begin to defend this evil from the Bible. Brother Calker here talks of the Presbyterian Church. Alas! in her skirts is found the blood of poor innocents, and she is willing for the sake of union to destroy them for whom Christ died. Brethren, you know not what you do. You enjoy the blessing of living in a land uncursed by any such evils. Your churches, your schools, and all your industrial institutions are going forward, while ours are going backward, and you do not feel it, because you do not live among us. But take care, one part of the country cannot become demoralised without at last affecting the other. The sin you cherish and strengthen by your indifference, may at last come back in judgments that may visit even you. I pray God to avert it! But as God is just, I tremble for you and for us. Well, good-bye, brethren, I must be on my way. You will not listen to me, and my soul cannot come into your counsels.' And father Dickson rose to depart.

Oh come, come, now, brother, don't take it so seriously,' said Dr. Cushing. 'Stay at least and spend the day with us, and let us have a little Christian talk.'

'I must go,' said father Dickson. 'I have an appointment to preach, which I must keep, for this evening, and I hoped to do something by coming here. But I see that is all in vain. Farewell, brethren, I shall pray for you.'

'Well, father Dickson, I should like to talk more with you on this subject,' said Dr. Cushing; 'do come again. It is very difficult to see the path of duty in these matters.'

Poor Dr. Cushing was one of those who are destined, like stationary ships, for ever to float up and down in one spot, only useful in marking the ebb and flow of the tide. Affection—generosity—devotion—he had everything but the power to move on. Clayton, who had seen at once that nothing was to be done or gained, rose and said, that his business was also pressing, and that he would accompany father Dickson on his way.

'What a good fellow Dickson is!' said Dr. Cushing, after he returned to the room.

'He exhibits a very excellent spirit,' said Dr. Packthread.

'Oh, Dickson would do well enough,' said Dr. Calker, 'if he wasn't a monomaniac—that's what's the matter with him; but when he gets to going on this subject, I never hear what he says. I know it's no use to reason with him. Entirely time lost. I have heard all these things over and over again.'

'But I wish,' said Dr. Cushing, 'something could be done.'

'Well who doesn't,' says Dr. Calker. 'We all wish something could be done. But if it can't, it can't. There's the end of it. So now let us proceed and look into business a little more particularly.'

'After all,' said Dr. Packthread, 'you old school brethren have greatly the advantage of us, for though you have a few poor good souls, like this Dickson, they are in so insignificant a minority, that they can do nothing; don't even get into the General Assembly, or send in a remonstrance or petition, or anything else; so that you are never plagued as we are. We cannot even choose a moderator from the slave-holding states, for fear of an explosion; but you can have slave-holding moderators, or anything else that will promote harmony and union.'

CHAPTER XLIII.

ON his return home Clayton took from the post-office a letter, which we will give to our readers:—

‘MR. CLAYTON,

‘I AM now an outcast. I cannot show my face in the world. I cannot go abroad by daylight, for no crime as I can see, except resisting oppression. Mr. Clayton, if it were proper for your fathers to fight and shed blood for the oppression that came upon them, why isn’t it right for us? They had not half the provocation that we have. Their wives and families were never touched. They were not bought and sold and traded like cattle in the market, as we are. In fact when I was reading that history, I could hardly understand what provocation they did have. They had everything easy and comfortable about them. They were able to support their families, even in luxury; and yet they were willing to plunge into war, and shed blood. I have studied the Declaration of Independence; the things mentioned there were bad and uncomfortable, to be sure; but after all, look at the laws which are put over us. Now, if they had forbidden them to teach their children to read. If they had divided them all out among masters, and declared them incapable of holding property as the mule before the plough, there would have been some sense in that revolution. Well, how was it with our people in South Carolina? Denmark Vesey was a man. His history is just what George Washington’s would have been if you had failed. What set him on in his cause? The Bible, and your Declaration of Independence. What does your Declaration say? “We hold these truths to be self-evident that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of any of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it.” Now what do you make of that? This is read to us every fourth of July. It was read to Denmark Vesey and Peter Poyers, and all those other brave good men, who dared to follow your example and your precepts. Well, they failed, and your people hung them. And they said they couldn’t conceive what motive could have induced them to make the effort. They had food enough and clothes enough, and were kept very comfortable. Well, had not your people clothes enough and food enough, and wouldn't you still have had enough even if you had remained a province of England to this day: much better living, much better clothes, and much better laws, than we have to-day? I heard your father's interpretation of the law. I heard Mr. Jekyll's: and yet when men rise up against such laws, you wonder what in the world could have induced them. That's perfectly astonishing.

'But of all the injuries and insults that are heaped upon us, there is nothing to me so perfectly maddening as the assumption of your religious men, who maintain and defend this enormous injustice by the Bible. We have all the right to rise against them that they had to rise against England. They tell us the Bible says "Servants, obey your masters." Well, the Bible says also, "The powers that be are ordained of God, and whoso resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God." If it was right for them to resist the ordinance of God, it is right for us. If the Bible does justify slavery, why don't they teach the slave to read it? And what's the reason that two of the greatest insurrections came from men who read scarcely anything else but the Bible?

'No, the fact is, they don't believe this themselves, if they did they would try the experiment fairly of giving the Bible to their slaves. I can assure you the Bible looks as different to a slave from what it does to a master as everything else in the world does. Now, Mr. Clayton, you understand that when I say you along here, I do not mean you personally, but the generality of the community of whom you are one. I want you to think these things over, and whatever my future course may be, remember my excuse for it is the same as that on which your government is built. I am very grateful to you for all your kindness—perhaps the time may come when I shall be able to show my gratitude. Meanwhile I must ask one favour of you, which I think you will grant, for the sake of that angel who is gone. I have a sister, who, as well as myself, is the child of Tom Gordon's father. She was beautiful and good, and her owner, who had a large estate in Mississippi, took her to Ohio, emancipated and married her. She has two children by him, a son and a daughter. He died and left his estate to her and her children. Tom Gordon is the heir-at-law. He has sued for the property and obtained it. The act of emancipation has been declared null and void, and my sister and her children are in the hands of that man, with all that absolute power, and they have no appeal from him for any evil whatever. She has escaped his hands, so she wrote me once, but I have heard a report that he has taken her again. The pious Mr. Jekyll will know all about it. Now, may I ask you to go to him, and make inquiries, and let me know? A letter sent to Mr. James Twichell, at the post-office near Canema, where our letters used to be taken, will get to me. By doing this favour you will secure my eternal gratitude.

‘HARRY GORDON.’

Clayton read this letter with some surprise, and a good deal of attention. It was written on very coarse paper, such as is commonly sold at the low shops. Where Harry was, and how concealed, was to him only a matter of conjecture. But the call to render him any assistance was to him a sacred one, and he determined on a horseback excursion to E——, the town where Mr. Jekyll resided.

He found that gentleman very busy in looking over and arranging papers in relation to that large property which had just come into Tom Gordon's hands. He began by stating that the former owner of the servants at Canema had requested him, on her death-bed, to take an interest in her servants. He had, therefore, called to ascertain if anything had been heard from Harry.

‘Not yet,’ said Mr. Jekyll, pulling up his shirt-collar. ‘Our plantations in this vicinity are very unfortunate in their proximity to the swamp. It's a great expense of time and money. Why, sir, it's inconceivable the amount of property that's lost in that swamp. I have heard it estimated at something like three millions of dollars. We follow them up with laws, you see. They are outlawed regularly after a certain time, and then the hunters go in and chase them down; sometimes kill two or three a-day, or something like that. But on the whole they don't effect much.’

‘Well,’ said Clayton, who felt no disposition to enter into any discussion with Mr. Jekyll, ‘so you think he is there?’

‘Yes, I have no doubt of it.’ The fact is, there's a fellow that's been seen lurking about this swamp off and on for years and years. Sometimes he isn't to be seen for months, and then again he is seen or heard of, but never so that anybody can get hold of him. I have no doubt the niggers on the plantation know him, but then you can never get anything out of them, Oh! they are deep! They are a dreadfully corrupt set.

'Mr. Gordon has, I think, a sister of Harry's, who came in with this new estate,' said Mr. Clayton.

'Yes, yes!' said Mr. Jekyll, 'she has given us a good deal of trouble, too. She got away, and went off to Cincinnatti, and I had to go up and hunt her out. It was really a great deal of trouble and expense. If I hadn't been assisted by the politeness and kindness of the marshal and brother officers, it would have been very bad. There is a good deal of religious society, too, in Cincinnatti, and so while I was waiting I attended anniversary meetings.'

'Then you did succeed,' said Clayton. 'I came to see whether Mr. Gordon would listen to a proposition for selling her.'

'Oh! he has sold her,' said Mr. Jekyll. 'She is at Alexandria now, in Beaton and Burn's establishment.'

'And her children, too?'

'Yes, the lot. I claim some little merit for that myself. Tom is a fellow of rather strong passions, and he was terribly angry for the trouble she had made. I don't know what he would have done to her if I hadn't talked to him. But I showed him some debts that couldn't be put off any longer without too much sacrifice, and on the whole I persuaded him to let her be sold. I have tried to exert a good influence over him in a quiet way,' said Mr. Jekyll. 'Now, if you want to get the woman, like enough she may not be sold away yet.'

Clayton, having thus ascertained the points which he wished to know, proceeded immediately to Alexandria. When he was there he found a considerable excitement. A slave woman, it was said, who was to have been sent off in a coffin the next day, had murdered her two children. The moment that Clayton heard the news, he felt an instinctive certainty that this woman was Cora Gordon. He went to the magistrate's court where the investigation was being held, and found it surrounded by a crowd so dense that it was with difficulty he forced his way in. At the bar he saw seated a woman dressed in black, whose face, haggard and wan, showed yet traces of former beauty. The splendid dark eyes had a peculiar and fierce expression. The thin lines of the face were settled into an immovable fixedness of calm determination. There was even an air of grave solemn triumph on her countenance. She appeared to regard the formalities of the court with the utmost indifference. At last she spoke, in a clear, thrilling, distinct voice—

'If gentlemen will allow me to speak, I'll save them the trouble of that examination of witnesses. It's going a long way round to find out a very little thing.'

There was an immediate movement of curiosity in the whole throng, and the officer said—

'You are permitted to speak.'

She rose deliberately and untied her bonnet strings, looked round the whole court, with a peculiar but calm expression of mingled triumph and power.

'You want to know,' she said, 'who killed those children? Well, I will tell you.' And again her eyes travelled round the house with that same strong defiant expression—'I killed them.'

There was a pause and a general movement through the house.

'Yes!' she said again, 'I killed them; and oh how glad I am that I have done it! Do you want to know what I killed them for? Because I loved them—loved them so well that I was willing to give up my soul to save theirs. I have heard some persons say that I was in a frenzy, excited, and didn't know what I was doing. They are mistaken, I was not in a frenzy, I was not excited, and I did know what I was doing, and I bless God that it is done. I was born the slave of my own father. Your old proud Virginia blood is in my veins, as it is in half of those you whip and sell. I was the lawful wife of a man of honour, who did what he could to evade your cruel laws, and set me free. My children were born to liberty—they were brought up to liberty, till my father's son entered a suit for us and made us slaves. Judge and jury helped him—all your laws and your officers helped him to take away the rights of the widow and the fatherless. The judge said that my son, being a slave, could no more hold property than the mule before his plough, and we were delivered into Tom Gordon's hands. I shall not say what he is; it is not fit to be said. God will show at the judgment-day. But I escaped with my children to Cincinnati. He followed me there, and the laws of your country gave me back to him. To-morrow I was to have gone in a coffin and leave these children. My son a slave for life. My daughter—'

She looked round the court-room with an expression which said more than words could have spoken.

'So I heard them say their prayers and sing their hymns, and then, while they were asleep and didn't know it, I sent them to lie down in green pastures with the Lord. They say this is a dreadful sin. It may be so. I am willing to lose my soul to have theirs saved. I have no more to hope or fear. It is all nothing now where I go or what becomes of me. But at any rate they are safe. And now, if any of you mothers, in my place, wouldn't have done the same, you either don't know what slavery is, or you don't love your children as I have loved mine. This is all.'

She sat down, folded her arms, fixed her eyes on the floor, and seemed like a person entirely indifferent to the further opinions and proceedings of the court.

She was remanded to gaol for trial.

Clayton determined in his own mind to do what he could for her. Her own declaration seemed to make the form of a trial unnecessary. He resolved, however, to do what he could to enlist for her the sympathy of some friends of his in the city.

The next day he called with a clergyman, and requested permission to see her. When they entered her cell, she rose to receive them with most perfect composure, as if they had called upon her in a drawing-room. Clayton introduced his companion as the Rev. Mr. Denton. There was an excited flash in her eyes, but she said calmly—

'Have the gentlemen business with me?'

'We called,' said the clergyman, 'to see if we could render you any assistance.'

'No, sir, you cannot,' was the prompt reply.

'My dear friend,' said the clergyman in a very kind tone, 'I wish it were in my power to administer to you the consolations of the gospel.'

'I have nothing to do,' she answered firmly, 'with ministers who pretend to preach the gospel and support oppression and robbery. Your hands are defiled with blood, so don't come to me. I am a prisoner here, and cannot resist; but when I tell you that I prefer to be left alone, perhaps it may have some effect, even if I am a slave.'

Clayton took out Harry's letter, handed it to her, and said:

'After you have read this, you will perhaps receive me, if I should call again to-morrow at this hour.'

The next day when Clayton called, he was conducted by the gaoler to the door of the cell.

'There is a lady with her now reading to her.'

'Then I ought not to interrupt her,' said Clayton, hesitating.

'Oh, I suspect it would make no odds,' said the gaoler.

Clayton laid his hand on his to stop him. The sound that came indistinctly through the door was the voice of prayer. Some woman was interceding in the presence of eternal pity for an oppressed and broken-hearted sister. After a few moments the door was partly opened, and he heard a sweet voice, saying:—

‘Let me come to you every day, may I? I know what it is to suffer.’

A smothered sob was the only answer, and then followed words imperfectly distinguished, which seemed to be those of consolation.

In a moment the door was opened, and Clayton found himself suddenly face to face with a lady in deep mourning. She was tall and largely proportioned. The outlines of her face strong, yet beautiful, and now wearing the expression which comes from communion with the highest and serenest nature. Both were embarrassed, and made a momentary pause. In the start she dropped one of her gloves. Clayton picked it up, handed it to her, bowed and she passed on. By some singular association this stranger, with a serious radiant face, suggested to him the sparkling, glittering beauty of Nina, and it seemed for a moment as if Nina was fluttering by him in the air and passing away after her. When he examined the emotion more minutely afterwards, he thought perhaps it might have been suggested by the perception, as he lifted the glove, of a peculiar and delicate perfume, which Nina was fond of using. So strange and shadowy are the influences which touch the dark electric chain of our existence.

When Clayton went in to the cell he found its inmate in a softened mood. There were traces of tears on her cheek, and an open Bible on the bed, but her appearance was calm and self-possessed as usual. She said—

‘Excuse my rudeness, Mr. Clayton, at your last visit. We cannot always command ourselves to do exactly what we should. I thank you very much for your kindness to us. There are many who are kindly disposed towards us, but it’s very little that they can do.’

‘Can I be of any assistance in securing counsel for you?’ said Clayton.

‘I don’t need any counsel—I don’t wish any,’ said she; ‘I shall make no effort; let the law take its course. If you ever should see Harry, give my love to him—that’s all. And if you can help him, pray do. If you have time, influence, or money to spare, and can get him to any country where he will have the common rights of a human being, pray do : and the blessing of the poor will come on you. That's all I have to ask.'

Clayton rose to depart. He had fulfilled the object of his mission. He had gained all the information, and more than all, that he wished. He queried with himself whether it were best to write to Harry at all. The facts that he had to relate were such as were calculated to kindle to a fierce flame the excitement which was now consuming him. He trembled when he thought of it, lest that excitement should blaze out in forms which should array against him with still more force that society with which he was already at war. Thinking, however, that Harry perhaps might obtain the information in some less guarded form, he sat down and wrote him the following letter :—

'I have received your letter. I need not say that I am sorry for all that has taken place ; sorry for your sake, and for the sake of one very dear both to me and to you. Harry, I freely admit that you live in a state of society which exercises a great injustice. I admit your right, and that of all men, to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I admit the right of an oppressed people to change their form of government if they can. I admit that your people suffer under greater oppression than ever our fathers suffered ; and if I believed that they were capable of obtaining and supporting a government, I should believe in their right to take the same means to gain it ; but I do not at present, and I think if you will reflect on the subject, you will agree with me. I do not think that, should they make an effort, they would succeed. They would only embitter the white races against them, and destroy that sympathy which many are beginning to feel for their oppressed condition. I know it seems a very unfeeling thing for a man who is at ease to tell one who is oppressed and suffering to be patient, and yet I must even say it ; it is my place, and our place, to seek repeal of the unjust laws which oppress you. I see no reason why the relation of master and servants may not be continued through our states, and the servants yet be freemen. I am satisfied that it would be for the best interests of master as well as slave. If this is the truth, time will make it apparent, and the change will come. With regard to you, the best counsel I can give is, that you try to escape to one of the northern states, and I will furnish you with means to begin life there, under better auspices. I am very sorry that I have to tell you something very painful about your sister. She was sold to a trading house in Alexandria, and in desperation has killed both her children. For this she is now in prison awaiting her trial. I have been to see her, and offered every assistance in my power. She declines all ; she does not wish to live ; and has already avowed the fact, making no defence, and wishing none to be made for her—another of the bitter fruits of this most unrighteous system ! She desired her love and kind wishes to you. Whatever more is to be known I will tell you at some future time.

‘After all that I have said to you in this letter, I cannot help feeling for myself how hard and cold and insufficient it must seem to you. If I had such a sister as yours, and her life had been so wrecked, I feel that I might not have patience to consider any of these things, and I am afraid you will not ; yet I feel this injustice to my heart—I feel it like a personal affliction, and, God helping me, I will make it the object of my life to remedy it. Your sister’s trial will not take place for some time, and she has friends who do all that can be done for her.’

Clayton returned to his father’s house, and related the result of his first experiment with the clergy.

‘Well, now,’ said Mrs. Clayton, ‘I must confess I was not prepared for this.’

‘I was,’ said Judge Clayton ; ‘it’s precisely what I expected. You have tried the Presbyterians with whom our family are connected, and now you may go successively to the Episcopalians, the Methodists, the Baptists, and you will hear the same story from them all. About half of them defend the thing from the Bible in the most unblushing, disgusting manner ; the other half acknowledge and lament it as an evil, but they are cowed and timid, and can do nothing.’

‘Well,’ said Clayton, ‘the greatest evidence to my mind of the inspiration of the Scriptures is, that they are yet afloat, when every new absurdity has been successively tacked to them.’

‘But,’ said Mrs. Clayton, ‘are there no people that are faithful ?’

‘None in this matter that I know of,’ said Judge Clayton, ‘except the Covenanters and the Quakers among us, and the Free-will Baptists and a few others in the North ; and their number and influence are so small that there can be no great calculation made on them for assistance. Of individuals, there are not a few who earnestly desire to do something ; but they are mostly without faith or hope, like me ; and from the communities—from the great organization of society—no help whatever is to be expected.’

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE DESERT.

THERE is no study in human nature more interesting than the aspects of the same subject seen in the points of view of different characters. One might almost imagine that there were no such thing as absolute truth, since a change of situation or temperament is capable of changing the whole force of an argument. We have been accustomed, even those of us who feel most, to look on the arguments for and against the system of slavery, with the eyes of those who are at ease. We do not even know how fair is freedom, for we were always free. We shall never have all the materials for absolute truth on this subject, till we take into account with our own views and reasonings the views and reasonings of those who have bowed down to the yoke and felt the iron enter into their souls. We all console ourselves too easily for the sorrows of others. We talk and reason coolly of that, which did we feel it ourselves, would take away all power of composure, and self-control. We have seen how the masters feel and reason, how good men feel and reason whose public opinion and Christian fellowship support the master, and give him confidence in his position. We must add also to our estimate the feelings and reasonings of the slave; and therefore the reader must follow us again to the fastness in the Dismal Swamp.

It is a calm, still, Indian summer afternoon. The whole air is flooded with a golden hue in which the tree tops move dreamily to and fro, as if in a whispering reverie. The wild climbing grapevines which hang in thousandfold festoons around the enclosure, are purpling with grapes. The little settlement now has among its inmates old Tiff and his children, and Harry and his wife. The children and Tiff had been received into the house of the widow whose husband had fallen a victim to the hunters, as we mentioned in one of our former chapters. All had united in building for Harry and Lisette a cabin contiguous to the other.

Old Tiff, with his habitual industry, might now be seen hoeing in the sweet-potato patch, which belonged to the common settlement. The children were roaming up and down looking after autumn flowers and grapes.

Dred, who had been out all the night before, was now lying on the ground on the shady side of the clearing with an old much-worn, much-thumbed copy of the Bible by his side. It was the Bible of Denmark Vesey; and in many a secret meeting its wild inspiring poetry had sounded like a trumpet in his youthful ear.

He lay with his elbow resting on the ground, his hands supporting his massive head, and his large, gloomy, dark eyes fixed in revery on the moving tree tops, as they waved in the golden blue—now his eyes followed sailing islands of white cloud, drifting to and fro above them. There were elements in him which might, under other circumstances, have made a poet.

His frame, capacious and energetic as it was, had yet that keenness of excitability which places the soul en rapport with all the great forces of Nature. The only book which he had been much in the habit of reading, the book in fact which had been the nurse and forming power of his soul, was the Bible—distinguished above all other literature for its intense sympathy with Nature. Dred, indeed, resembled in organisation and tone of mind some of those men of old who were dwellers in the wilderness, and drew their inspirations in the desert. It is remarkable that in all ages, communities and individuals who have suffered under oppression, have always fled for refuge to the Old Testament, and to the book of Revelation in the New. Even if not definitely understood, these magnificent compositions have a wild and inspiring power, like a wordless yet impassioned symphony, played by a sublime orchestra, in which deep and awful sub-base instruments mingle with those of ethereal softness, and wild minors twine and interlace with marches of battles and bursts of victorious harmony.

They are much mistaken who say that nothing is efficient as a motive that is not definitely understood. Who ever thought of understanding the mingled wail and roar of the Marseillaise? Just this kind of indefinite stimulating power has the Bible to the souls of the oppressed. There is also a disposition which has manifested itself since the primitive times, by which the human soul bowed down beneath the weight of mighty oppressions, and despairing in its own weakness, seizes with avidity the intimations of a coming judgment, in which the Son of Man, appearing in His glory and all His holy angels with him, shall right earth's mighty wrongs.

In Dred's mind this thought had acquired an absolute ascendancy. All things in nature and in revelation he interpreted by this key. During the prevalence of the cholera, he had been pervaded by a wild and solemn excitement. To him it was the opening of a seal,—the sounding of the trumpet of the first angel. And other woes were yet to come.

He was not a man of personal malignity to any human being. When he contemplated schemes of insurrection and bloodshed, he contemplated them with the calm, immovable firmness of one who felt himself an instrument of doom in a mightier hand. In fact, although seldom called into exercise by the incidents of his wild and solitary life, there was in him a vein of that gentleness which softens the heart towards children and the inferior animals. The amusement of his vacant hours was sometimes to exercise his peculiar gifts over the animal creation, by drawing towards him the birds and squirrels from the coverts of the forest, and giving them food. Indeed he commonly carried corn in the hunting dress which he wore to use for this purpose. Just at this moment, as he lay absorbed in revery, he heard Teddy, who was near him, calling to his sister—

‘Oh, Fanny, do come and see this squirrel, he is so pretty.’

Fanny came running eagerly.

‘Where is he?’ she said.

‘Oh, he is gone—he just went behind that tree.’

The children, in their eagerness, had not perceived how near they were to Dred. He had turned his face towards them, and was looking at them with a pleased expression, approaching to a smile.

‘Do you want to see him?’ he said. ‘Stop a few minutes.’

He rose and scattered a train of corn between him and the thicket, and sitting down on the ground, began making a low sound, resembling the call of the squirrel to its young. In a few moments, Teddy and Fanny were in a tremor of eager excitement, as a pair of little bright eyes appeared among the leaves, and gradually their owner, a brisk little squirrel, came out and began rapidly filling its chaps with the corn. Dred still continued, with his eyes fixed on the animal, to make the same noise. Very soon two others were seen, following their comrade. The children laughed when they saw the headmost squirrel walk into Dred’s hand, which he had laid upon the ground, the others soon following his example. Dred took them up, and softly stroking them, they seemed to become entirely amenable to his will. And to amuse the children, he let them go into his hunting-pouch, to eat the corn that was there. After this they seemed to make a rambling expedition over his whole person, investigating his pockets, hiding themselves in the bosom of his shirt, and seeming apparently perfectly fearless and at home. Fanny reached out her hand timidly.

‘Won’t they come to me?’ she said.

‘No, daughter,’ said Dred, with a smile, ‘they don’t know you. In the new earth the enmity will be taken away, and then they’ll come.’

‘I wonder what he means by the new earth!’ said Fanny.

Dred seemed to feel a kind of pleasure in the admiration of the children, to which, perhaps, no one is wholly insensible. He proceeded, therefore, to show them some other of his accomplishments. The wood was resounding with the afternoon song of birds, and Dred suddenly began answering to one of the songsters with an exact imitation of his note. The bird evidently heard it, and answered back with still more spirit, and thus an animated conversation was kept up for some time.

‘You see,’ he said, ‘that I understand the speech of birds. After the great judgment the elect shall talk with the birds and the beasts in the new earth. Every kind of bird has a different language, in which they show why men should magnify the Lord and turn from their wickedness. But the sinners cannot hear it because their ear is waxed gross.’

‘I didn’t know,’ said Fanny, hesitatingly, ‘as that was so. How did you find it out?’

‘The Spirit of the Lord revealed it unto me, child.’

‘What is the Spirit?’ said Fanny, who felt more encouraged as she saw Dred stroking a squirrel.

‘It’s the Spirit that spoke in the old prophets,’ he said.

‘Did it tell you what the birds say?’

‘I am not perfected in holiness yet, and cannot receive it. But the birds fly up near the heavens, wherefore they learn droppings of the speech of angels. I never kill the birds, because the Lord hath set them between us and the angels for a sign.’

‘What else did the Spirit tell you?’ said Teddy.

‘He showed me that there was a language in the leaves,’ said Dred, ‘for I rose and looked, and behold there were signs drawn on the leaves, and forms of every living thing—with strange words—which the wicked understand not, but the elect shall read them. And behold the signs are in blood—which is the blood of the Lamb, that descendeth like dew from heaven.’

And behold the signs are in blood—which is the blood of the Lamb, that descendeth like dew from heaven.’

Fanny looked puzzled.

‘Who are the elect?’ she said.

‘They,’ said Dred, ‘they are the hundred and forty and four thousand that follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. And the angels have charge, saying, “Hurt not the earth, till these are sealed in their forehead.”’

Fanny instinctively put her hand to her forehead.

‘Do you think they’ll seal me?’ she said.

‘Yes,’ said Dred, ‘such as you are of the kingdom of heaven.’

‘Did the Spirit tell you that?’ said Fanny, who felt some considerable anxiety.

‘Yea, the Spirit hath shown me many such things,’ said Dred. ‘It hath also revealed to me the knowledge of the elements, the revolutions of the planets, the operations of tide, and changes of the seasons.’

Fanny looked doubtfully, and taking up her basket of wild grapes, slowly moved off, thinking that she would ask Tiff about it.

At this moment there was a rustling in the branches of the oak-tree which overhung a part of the clearing near where Dred was lying, and Harry soon dropped from the branches on to the ground. Dred started up to receive him.

‘How is it?’ said he; ‘will they come?’

‘Yes, by midnight to-night they will be here.—See here,’ he added, taking a letter from his pocket, ‘what I have received.’

It was the letter which Clayton had written to Harry. It was remarkable as Dred received it, how the wandering, mystical expression of his face immediately gave place to one of shrewd and practical earnestness. He sat down on the ground, laid it on his knee, and followed the lines with his finger. Some passages he seemed to read over two or three times with the greatest attention, and would pause after reading them and sit with his eyes fixed gloomily on the ground. The last part seemed to agitate him strongly. He gave a sort of suppressed groan.

‘Harry,’ he said, turning to him at last, ‘behold the day shall come when the Lord shall take out of our hand the cup of trembling, and put it into the hand of those that oppress us. Our soul is exceedingly filled now with the scorning of them that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud. The prophets prophesy falsely; the rulers bear rule by their means, and the people love to have it so. But what will it be in the end thereof? Their own wickedness shall reprove them, and their backsliding shall correct them. Listen to me, Harry,' he said, taking up his Bible, 'and see what the Lord saith unto thee, "Thus saith the Lord my God, feed the flock of the slaughter: whose possessors slay them and hold themselves not guilty, and they that sell them say, Blessed be the Lord for I am rich. And their own shepherds pity them not; for I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, saith the Lord. But lo, I will deliver the men, every one, into his neighbour's hand, and into the hand of his king. And they shall smite the land, and out of their hand I will not deliver them. And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, oh ye poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves, the one I called Beauty and the other I called Bands. And I fed the flock. And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people. And it was broken in that day, so the poor of the flock that waited on me knew it was the word of the Lord. Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel. The burden of the word of the Lord for Israel, saith the Lord, which stretcheth forth the heavens and layeth the foundations of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him. Behold I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling to all the people round about. Also in that day I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people. All that burden themselves with it shall be cut to pieces. In that day, saith the Lord, I will smite every horse with astonishment, and every rider with madness. And I will open mine eyes on the house of Judah, and will smite every horse of the people with blindness. In that day I will make the governors of Judah like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf, and they shall devour all the people on the right and the left." Harry,' said he, 'these things are written for our learning. We will go up and take away her battlements, for they are not the Lord's.'

The gloomy fervour with which Dred read these words of Scripture, selecting, as his eye glanced down the prophetic pages, passages whose images most affected his own mind, carried with it an overpowering mesmeric force. Who shall say that in this world, where all things are symbolic, bound together by mystical resemblances, and where one event is the archetype of thousands, that there is not an eternal significance in these old prophecies!

Do they not bring with them springing and germinant fulfilments, wherever there is a haughty and oppressive nation and a "flock of the slaughtered?"

'Harry,' said Dred, 'I have fasted and prayed before the Lord, lying all night on my face, yet the token cometh not! Behold, there are prayers that resist me! The Lamb yet beareth and the opening of the record seal delayeth; yet the Lord had shown unto me that we should be up and doing, to prepare the way for the coming of the Lord. The Lord hath said unto me, "Speak to the elders and the prudent men, and prepare their hearts."'

'One thing,' said Harry, 'fills me with apprehension. Hark, that brought me this letter, was delayed in getting back, and I'm afraid that he'll get into trouble. Tom Gordon is raging like a fury over the people of our plantation. They have always been held under a very mild rule, and every one knows that a plantation, so managed is not so immediately profitable as it can be made for a short time by forcing everything up to the highest notch; he has got a man there for overseer, old Hokum, that has been famous for his hardness and meanness, and he has delivered the people unreservedly into his hands; he drinks and frolics, and has his oyster suppers, and swears he'll shoot any one that brings him a complaint. Hokum is to pay him so much yearly, and have to himself all that he makes over. Tom Gordon keeps two girls there that he bought for himself and his fellows, just as he wanted to keep my wife.'

'Be patient, Harry; this is a great Christianising institution,' said Dred, with a tone of grave irony.

'I am afraid for Hark,' said Harry; 'he is the bravest of brave fellows; he is ready to do anything for us. But if he is taken there will be no mercy.'

Dred looked on the ground gloomily—'Hark was to be here to-night,' he said.

'Yes,' said Harry, 'I wish we may see him.'

'Harry,' said Dred, 'when they come to-night, read them the Declaration of Independence of these United States, and then let each one judge of our afflictions, and the afflictions of their fathers, and the Lord shall be judge between us. I must go and seek counsel of the Lord.'

Dred rose, and, giving a leap from the ground, caught on the branch of the oak which overhung their head, and swinging himself on the limb, climbed in the thickn  ss of the branches and disappeared from view. Harry walked to the other side of the clearing where his lodge had been erected. He found Lisette busy within. She ran to meet him, and threw her arms around his neck.

‘I am so glad you’ve come back, Harry; it is so dreadful to think what may happen to you while you are gone. Harry, I think we could be very happy here. See what a nice bed I have made in this corner out of leaves and moss. The women are both very kind; and I am glad we have got old Tiff and the children here, it makes it seem more natural. See, I went out with them this afternoon, and how many grapes I have got. What have you been talking to that dreadful man about? Do you know, Harry, he makes me afraid. They say he is a prophet. Do you think he is?’

‘I don’t know, child,’ said Harry, abstractedly.

‘Don’t stay with him too much,’ said Lisette. ‘He’ll make you as gloomy as he is.’

‘Do I need any one to make me gloomy?’ said Harry. ‘Am I not gloomy enough? Am I not an outcast, and you too, Lisette?’

‘It isn’t so very dreadful to be an outcast,’ said Lisette. ‘God makes wild grapes for us if we are outcasts.’

‘Yes, child,’ said Harry, ‘you are right.’

‘And the sun shines so pleasant this afternoon,’ said Lisette.

‘Yes,’ said Harry, ‘but by-and-by, cold storms and rain will come and frosty weather.’

‘Well,’ said Lisette, ‘then we will think what to do next. But don’t let us lose this afternoon and these grapes at any rate.’

CHAPTER XLV.

JEGAR—SAHADUTHA.

At twelve o’clock that night, Harry rose from the side of his sleeping wife, and looked out into the darkness. The belt of forest which surrounded them seemed a girdle of impenetrable blackness; but above, where the tree tops fringed out against the sky, the heavens were seen of a deep transparent violet, blazing with stars. He opened the door and came out. All was so intensely still, that even the rustle of a leaf could be heard. He stood listening. A low whistle seemed to come from a distant part of the underwood. He answered it. Soon a crackling was heard, and a sound of cautious suppressed conversation. In a few moments a rustling was heard in the boughs overhead. Harry stepped under.

‘Who is there?’ he said.

‘The camp of the Lord’s judgment,’ was the answer, and a dark form dropped on the ground.

‘Hannibal?’ said Harry.

‘Yes, Hannibal,’ said the voice.

‘Thank God,’ said Harry.

But now the boughs of the tree were continually rustling, and one after another sprang down to the ground, each one of whom pronounced his name as he came.

‘Where is the prophet?’ said one.

‘He is not here,’ said Harry; ‘fear not, he will be with us.’

The party now proceeded to walk, talking in low voices.

‘There’s nobody from the Gordon place, yet,’ said Harry, uneasily.

‘They’ll be along,’ said one of them. ‘Perhaps Hokum was wakeful to-night. They’ll give him the slip though.’

The company had now arrived at the lower portion of the clearing, where stood the blasted tree, which we formerly described, with its funeral wreaths of moss. Over the grave which had been recently formed there, Dred had piled a rude and ragged monument of stumps of trees and tufts of moss, and leaves.

On the top of one of the highest stumps was stuck a pine-knot, to which Harry now applied a light. It kindled, and rose with a broad red fuliginous glare, casting a sombre light on the circle of dark faces around. There were a dozen men—mulatto, quadroon, and negro. Their countenances all wore an expression of stern gravity and considerate solemnity.

The first act was, to clasp their hands in a circle, and join in a solemn oath never to betray each other. The moment this was done, Dred emerged mysteriously from the darkness, and stood among them.

‘Brethren,’ he said, ‘this is the grave of your brother, whose wife they would take for a prey; therefore he fled to the wilderness. But the assembly of the wicked compassed him about, and the dogs tore him and licked up his blood, and here I buried him. Wherefore this heap is called JEGAR—SAHADUTHA. For the God of Abraham and Nahor, the God of their fathers, shall judge betwixt us. He that regardeth not the oath of brethren, and betrayeth counsel, let his arm fall from his shoulder-blade—let his arm be broken from the bone. Behold, this heap shall be a witness unto you, for it hath heard all the words that ye have spoken.'

A deep murmured 'Amen' rose solemnly among them.

'Brethren,' said Dred, laying his hand upon Harry, 'the Lord caused Moses to become the son of Pharaoh's daughter, that he might become learned in the wisdom of the Egyptians, to lead forth his people from the house of bondage. And when he slew an Egyptian he fled into the wilderness, where he abode certain days till the time of the Lord was come. In like manner hath the Lord dealt with our brother. He shall expound unto you the laws of the Egyptians; and for me, I will show unto you what I have received from the Lord.'

The circle now sat down on the graves which were scattered around, and Harry thus spoke:

'Brothers, how many of you have been at fourth of July celebrations?'

'I have! I have! All of us!' was the deep response; uttered not eagerly, but in low and earnest tones.

'Brethren, I wish to explain to you to-night the story that they celebrate. It was years ago that this people was small, and poor, and despised, and was governed by men sent by the king of England; who, they say, oppressed them. Then they resolved that they would be free, and govern themselves in their own way, and make their own laws. For this they were called rebels and conspirators, and if they had failed, every one of their leaders would have been hung, and nothing more said about it. When they were agreeing to do this, they met together and signed a paper which was to show to all the world the reason why. You have heard this read by them when the drums were beating and the banners flying; now hear it here while you sit on the graves of men they have murdered.'

And standing by the light of the flaring torch, Harry read that document which has been fraught with so much seed for all time. What words were those to fall on the ear of thoughtful bondmen! "Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. When a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a determination to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right and their duty to throw off such government."

'Brothers,' said Harry, 'you have heard the grievances which our masters thought sufficient to make it right for them to shed blood. They rose up against their king, and when he sent his armies into the country they fired at them from the windows of the houses, and from behind the barns, and from out of the trees, and wherever they passed, till they were strong enough to get together an army and fight them openly.'

'Yes,' said Hannibal, 'I heard my master's father tell of it; he was one of them.'

'Now,' said Harry, 'the Lord judge between us and them, if the laws that they put upon us be not worse than any that lay upon them. They complained that they could not get justice done to them in the courts; but how stands it with us, who cannot even come into a court to plead?'

Harry, then, in earnest and vehement language, narrated the abuse which had been inflicted upon Milly, and then recited, in a clear and solemn voice, that judicial decision which had burned itself into his memory, and which had confirmed and given full licence to that despotic power. He related the fate of his own contract, of his services for years to the family for which he had laboured, all ending in worse than nothing; and then he told his sister's history, till his voice was broken by sobs. The audience who sat around were profoundly solemn, only occasionally a deep smothered groan seemed to rise from them involuntarily.

Hannibal rose. 'I had a master in Virginny. He was a Methodist preacher. He sold my wife and two children to Orleans, and then sold me. My next wife was took for debt, and she's gone.'

A quadroon young man rose. 'My mother was held by a minister in Kentucky. My father was a good hard-working man. There was a man set his eye on her and wanted her, but she wouldn't have anything to do with him. Then she told her master, and begged him to protect her, but he sold her. Her hair turned all white in one year, and she went crazy, and she was crazy till she died.'

'I h' got a story to tell on that,' said a middle-aged negro man of low stature, broad shoulders, and a countenance indicative of great resolution, who now rose. 'Ise got a story to tell.'

'Go on Monday,' said Harry.

'You spoke 'bout de laws, I's seen bout dem ar. Now, my brother Sam he worked with me on de great Morton place in Virginny. And dere was going to be a wedding dere, and dey wanted money, and so some of de coloured people was sold to Tom Parker, 'cause Tom Parker he was a buying up round dat ar fall, and he sold him to Souther, and he was one o' yer's drefful mean white trash dat lived down to de bush. Well, Sam was nigh 'bout starved; and so he had to help hisself the best way he could; and he used fur to trade off one thing and 'nother for meal to Stone's store, and Souther he told him "dat he'd give him hell if he caught him." So one day when he missed something off de place he come home, and he brought Stone with him and a man named Harvey. "He told him that he was going to catch it." I reckon dey was all three drunk. Any how they tied him up, and Souther he never stopped to cut him, and to slash him and hack him, and dey burned him with chunks from de fire, and dey scalded him with boiling water. He was strong man, but dey worked on him that way all day, and at last he died. They hearn his screeches on all de places round. Now, brethren, you just see what was done 'bout it. Why massa and some of the gentlemen round said dat Souther "wasn't fit to live," and it should be brought in de courts, and sure 'nough it was; and 'cause he is my own brother I listened for what dey would say. Well, fust dey begun with saying that it warn't no murder at all, 'cause slaves dey said wasn't people, and dey couldn't be murdered. But den the man on t'other side he read heaps of things to shew, that dey was people, that dey was human critturs. Then de lawyer said dat dere wan't no evidence that Souther meant fur to kill him any how. Dat it was de right of de master to punish his slave any way he thought fit. And how was he going to know that it would kill him? Well so dey had it back and forth; and finally de jury said "it was murder in de second degree." Lor', if dat ar's bein murdered in de second degree, I like to know what de fust is! So you see dey said he must go to de Penitentiary for five years. But laws he didn't! 'cause dere's ways enough o' getting out of dese yer things,—'cause he took it up to de upper court, and dey said dat it had been settled dat dere couldn't be nothing done agin a master, for no kind of beating, or 'busing of dere own slaves. Dat de master must be protected, even if it was ever so cruel.*

* Lest any of our readers should think the dark witness, who is speaking, mistaken in his hearing, we will quote here the words which stand on the Virginia law records in reference to this very case:—

"It has been decided by this court, in Turner's case, that the owner of a slave, for the malicious, cruel, and excessive beating of his own slave, cannot be indicted. * * * It is the policy of the law in respect to the relation of master and slave, and for the sake of securing proper subordination and

So now, brethren, what do you think of dat ar'?"

At this moment another person entered the circle. There was a general start of surprise and apprehension, which immediately gave place to a movement of satisfaction and congratulation.

'You have come, have you, Henry?' said Harry.

But at this moment the other turned his face full to the torch-light, and Harry was struck with its ghastly expression.

'For God's sake what's the matter, Henry? Where's Hark?'

'Dead!' said the other.

As one struck with a pistol-shot leaps in the air, Harry bounded with a cry from the ground.

'Dead!' he echoed.

'Yes; dead at last! Dey was all last night a killing of him.'

'I thought so! Oh, I was afraid of it!' said Harry. 'Oh, Hark!—Hark!—Hark! God do so to me and more also, if I forget this!'

The thrill of a present interest drew every one around the narrator, who proceeded to tell how Hark having been too late on his return to the plantation, had incurred the suspicion of being in communication with Harry—how Hokum, Tom Gordon, and two of his drunken associates, had gathered together to examine him by scourging—how his shrieks the night before had chased sleep from every hut of the plantation—how he died, and gave no sign. When he was through there was a dead and awful silence.

Dred, who had been sitting during most of these narrations, bowed, with his head between his knees, groaning within himself, like one who is wrestling with repressed feelings, now rose, and solemnly laying his hand on the mound, said,—

'Jegar—Sahadutha! The God of their fathers judge between us. If they had a right to rise up for their oppressions, shall they condemn us? For judgment is turned away backward and justice standeth afar off; truth is fallen in the street and equity cannot enter. Yea, truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey. They are not ashamed, neither can obedience on the part of the slave, to protect the master from prosecution, even if the whipping and punishment be malicious, cruel, and excessive."—(7th Grattan 673, 1851.—Souther v. the Commonwealth.)

Any one who has sufficiently strong nerves to peruse the records of this trial will see the effect of the slave system on the moral sensibilities of educated men.

they blush. . They declare their sin as Sodom, and hide it not. The mean man boweth down, and the great man humbleth himself, therefore forgive them not, saith the Lord.'

Dred paused a moment, and stood with his hands uplifted. As a thunder-cloud trembles and rolls, shaking with gathering electric fire, so his dark figure seemed to dilate and quiver with the force of mighty emotions. He seemed at the moment some awful form framed to symbolise to human eye the energy of that avenging justice which all nature shudderingly declares.

He trembled, his hands quivered—drops of perspiration rolled down his face—his gloomy eyes dilated with an unutterable volume of emotion. At last the words heaved themselves up in deep-chest tones, resembling the wild hollow wail of a wounded lion, finding vent in language to him so familiar that it rolled from his tongue in a spontaneous torrent, as if he had received their full inspiration.

'Hear ye the word of the Lord against this people. The harvest groweth ripe! the press is full! the vats overflow! Behold, saith the Lord—behold, saith the Lord, I will gather all nations, and bring them down to the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them for my people, whom they have scattered among the nations. Woe unto them, for they have cast lots for my people, and given a boy for a harlot, and sold a girl for wine, that they may drink. For three transgressions of Israel and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, saith the Lord. Because they sold the righteous for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes. They pant after the dust on the head of the poor, and turn aside the way of the meek. And a man and his father will go in unto the same maid, to profane my holy name. Behold, saith the Lord, I am pressed under you, as a cart is pressed full of sheaves.

'The burden of the beasts of the south! The land of trouble and anguish, from whence cometh the young and old lion, the viper, and fiery flying serpent! Go write it upon a table and note it in a book, that it may be for time to come, for ever and ever. That this is a rebellious people, lying children—children that will not hear the law of the Lord—which say to the seers see not—prophecy not unto us right things—speak unto us smooth things—prophecy deceits. Wherefore, thus saith the Holy One of Israel, Because ye despise His word, and trust in oppression and perverseness, and stay thereon, therefore this iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall, swelling out in a high wall, whose breaking cometh suddenly in an instant, and ye shall break it as the breaking of a potter's vessel.'

Pausing for a moment, he stood with his hands tightly clasped before him, leaning forward, looking into the distance. At last, with the action and energy of one who beholds a triumphant reality, he broke forth—

'Who is this that cometh from Edom, in dyed garments from Bozrah? This that is glorious in his apparel—travelling in the greatness of his strength.'

He seemed to listen, and as if he had caught an answer, he repeated—

'I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-press? I have trodden the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in my anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled on my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in my heart, and the year of my redeemed is come. And I looked and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation, and my fury it upheld me. And I will tread down the people in mine anger, and make them drunk in my fury.'

Gradually the light faded from his face. His arms fell. He stood a few moments with his head bowed down on his breast, yet the spell of his emotion held every one silent. At last, stretching out his hand, he broke forth in impassioned prayer:—

'How long? O Lord, how long? Awake! why sleepest thou, O Lord? Why withdrawest thou thy hand? Pluck it out of thy bosom. We see not the sign. There is no more any prophet, neither any among us that knoweth how long. Wilt thou hold thy peace for ever? Behold the blood of the poor crieth unto thee! Behold how they hunt for our lives. Behold how they pervert justice, and they take away the key of knowledge! They enter not in themselves, and those that are entering in they hinder. Behold our wives taken for a prey! Behold our daughters sold to be harlots! Art thou a God that judgest on the earth? Wilt thou not avenge thine own elect, that cry unto thee day and night? Behold the scorning of them that are at ease, and the contempt of the proud. Behold how they speak wickedly concerning oppression. They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth. . Wilt thou hold thy peace for all these things, and afflict us very sore ?

The energy of the emotion which had sustained him, appeared gradually to have exhausted itself, and after standing silent for a few moments, he seemed to gather himself together, as a man awaking out of a trance, and turning to the excited circle around him, he motioned them to sit down, when he spoke, to them in his ordinary tone.

‘Brethren,’ he said, ‘the vision is sealed up, and the token is not yet come. The Lamb still beareth the yoke of their iniquities, and there be prayers in the golden censers, which go up like a cloud. And there is silence in heaven for the space of half an hour. But hold yourselves in waiting, for the day cometh. And what shall be the end thereof?’

A deep voice answered Dred ; it was that of Hannibal.

‘We will reward them as they have rewarded us. In the cup that they have filled to us, we will measure to them again.’

‘God forbid,’ said Dred, ‘that the elect of the Lord should do that. When the Lord saith unto us, “Smite!” then will we smite. We will not torment them with the scourge and fire, nor defile their women, as they have done with ours. But we will slay them utterly, and consume them from off the face of the earth.’

At this moment the whole circle were startled by the sound of a voice, which seemed to proceed deep in from among the trees, singing in a wild and mournful tone the familiar words of a hymn—

‘Alas ! and did my Saviour bleed,
And did my Sovereign die ;
Would he devote ~~that~~ sacred head
For such a wretch as I ?’

There was a dead silence, as the voice approached still nearer, and the chorus was borne upon the night air—

‘Oh, de Lamb, de loving Lamb,
De Lamb of Calvary ;
De Lamb dat was slain, but liveth again
To intercede for me.’

And as the last two lines were sung, Milly emerged and stood in the centre of the group.

When Dred saw her, he gave a kind of groan, and said, putting his hand out before his face—

‘Woman, thy prayers withstand me.’

‘Oh, brethren!’ said Milly, ‘I mistrusted of your councils and I’ve been praying de Lord for you. Oh, brethren! behold de Lamb of God! If dere must come a day of vengeance, pray not to be in it. It’s de Lord’s strange work. Oh, brethren! is we de first that’s been took to de judgment-seat—dat’s been scourged—died in torments? Oh, brethren! who did it afore us? Didn’t He hang bleeding three hours, when dey mocked Him and gave Him vinegar? Didn’t He sweat great drops of blood in de garden?’

And Milly sung again words so familiar to many of them, that involuntarily several voices joined her :

‘Agonising in de garden,
On de ground your Maker lies;
On de bloody tree behold Him,
Hear Him cry before He dies:
It is finished!
Sinners will not dis suffice?’

‘Oh, won’t it suffice, brethren?’ she said. ‘If de Lord could bear all that and love us yet! Shan’t we? Oh, brethren! dere’s a better way. I’ve been where you be, I’ve been in de wilderness. Yes, I’ve heard de sound of dat ar trumpet. Ah, brethren, brethren, dere was blackness and darkness dere! But I’ve come to Jesus, de Mediator of de New Covenant, and de blood of sprinkling, which speaketh better things than dat or Abel. Hasn’t I suffered? My heart has been broke over and over for every chile de Lord gave me. And when dey sold my poor Alfred, and shot him, and buried him like a dog! Oh, but didn’t my heart burn! Oh, how I hated her that sold him! I felt like I’d kill her! I felt like I’d be glad to see mischief come on her chil’en! But, brethren, de Lord turned and looked upon me, like He done on Peter. I saw him with de crown of thorns on his head, bleeding—bleeding; and I broke down and forgave her. And de Lord turned her heart, and He was our peace. He broke down de middle wall between us, and we just come togeder, two poor sinners, to de foot of de cross. De Lord, He judged her poor soul! She warn’t let off from her sins. Her chil’en growed up to be a plague and a curse to her. Dey broke her heart. Oh, she was saved by fire! but, bress de Lord, she was saved! She died with her poor head on my arm—she that had broken my heart! Wasn’t that better than if I had killed her? Oh, brethren! pray de Lord to give dem repentance! Leave de vengeance to Him. Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith de Lord. Like He loved us when we was enemies, love your enemies !'

A dead silence followed this appeal. The key-note of another harmony had been struck. At last, Drod rose up solemnly :

'Woman, thy prayers have prevailed for this time,' he said. 'The hour is not yet come.'

CHAPTER XLVI.

FRANK RUSSEL'S OPINIONS.

CLAYTON was still pursuing the object which he had undertaken. He determined to petition the legislature to grant to the slave the right of seeking legal redress in cases of injury, and, as a necessary step to this, the right of bearing testimony in legal action. As Frank Russel was candidate for the next state legislature, he visited him for the purpose of getting him to present such a petition.

Our readers will look in on the scene in a small retired back room of Frank's office, where his bachelor establishment as yet was kept. Clayton had been giving him an earnest account of his plans and designs.

'The only safe way of gradual emancipation,' said Clayton, 'is the reforming of law, and the beginning of all legal reform must of course be, giving the slave legal personality. It's of no use to enact laws for his protection in his family state, or in any other condition, till we open to him an avenue through which, if they are violated, his grievances can be heard, and can be proved. A thousand laws for his comfort without this, are only a dead letter.'

'I know it,' said Frank Russel. 'There never was anything under heaven so atrocious as our slave code. It's a bottomless pit of oppression. Nobody knows it so well as we lawyers. But then, Clayton, it's quite another thing, what's to be done about it.'

'Why, I think it's very plain what's to be done,' said Clayton ; 'go right forward and enlighten the community. Get the law reformed. That's what I have taken for my work, and, Frank, you must help me.'

'Hum,' said Frank. 'Now the fact is, Clayton, if I wore a stiff white neckcloth, and had a D.D. to my name, I should tell you that the interests of Zion stood in the way, and that it was my duty to preserve my influence for the sake of being able to take care of the Lord's affairs. But as I am not so fortunate, I must just say without further preface, that it won't do for me to compromise Frank Russel's interests. Clayton, I can't afford it, that's just it. It won't do. You see our party can't take up that kind of thing. It would be just setting up a fort from which our enemies could fire on us at their leisure. If I go in to the legislature, I have to go in by my party; I have to represent my party; and of course I can't afford to do anything that will compromise them.'

'Well now, Frank,' said Clayton, 'seriously and soberly, are you going to put your neck into such a noose as this, to be led about all your life long the bond-slave of a party?'

'Not by a good deal,' said Russel. 'The noose will change ends one of these days, and I'll drag the party. But we must, all stoop to conquer at first.'

'And do you really propose nothing more to yourself than how to rise in the world?' said Clayton. 'Isn't there any great and good work that has beauty for you? Isn't there anything in heroism and self-sacrifice?'

'Well,' said Russel, after a short pause, 'maybe there is—but after all, Clayton—Is there? The world looks to me like a confounded humbug—great hoax. Everybody is going in for grub, and I say, hang it all! why shouldn't I have some of the grub as well as the rest?'

'“Man shall not live by bread alone,”' said Clayton.

'Bread is a pretty good thing though, after all,' said Frank, shrugging his shoulders.

'But,' said Clayton, 'Frank, I am in earnest, and you've got to be. I want you to go with me right down to the depths of your soul, where the water is still, and talk to me on honour. This kind of half-joking way that you have isn't a good sign, Frank—it's too old for you. A man that makes a joke of everything at your age, what will he do before he is fifty? Now, Frank, you do know that this system of slavery, if we don't reform it, will eat out this country like a cancer.'

'I know it,' said Frank. 'For that matter it has eaten into us pretty well.'

'Now,' said Clayton, 'if for nothing else, if we had no feeling of humanity for the slave, we must do something for the sake of the whites, for it is carrying us back into barbarism as fast as we can go. Virginia has been ruined by it—ran all down. North Carolina, I believe, has the enviable notoriety of being the most ignorant and poorest state in the union. I don't believe there's any country in old despotic Europe where the poor are more miserable, vicious, and degraded, than they are in our slave states. And it's depopulating us. Our men of ability in our lower classes, who want to be respectable, won't stand it. They will go off to some state where things move on. Hundreds and hundreds move out of North Carolina every year, to the western states. And it's all this unnatural organization of society that does it. We have got to contemplate some mode of abolishing this evil. We have got to take the first step towards progress some time, or we ourselves are all undone.'

'Clayton,' said Frank, in a tone now quite as serious as his own, 'I tell you as a solemn fact, that we can't do it; those among us who have got the power in their hands, are determined to keep it, and they are wide awake. They don't mean to let the first step be taken; because they don't mean to lay down their power. The two-thirds* votes that they get by it is a thing they won't part with: they'll die first. Why just look at it: there is at least twenty-four millions of property held in this way. What do you suppose these men care about the poor whites, and the ruin of the state, and all that. The poor whites may go to the devil for all them. As for the ruin of the state it won't come in their day, and "after us the deluge," you know. That's the talk. These men are our masters; they are yours, they are mine. They are masters of everybody in these United States. They can crack their whip over the head of any statesman or clergyman, from Maine to New Orleans, that disputes their will. They govern the country; army, navy, treasury, church, state, everything is theirs, and whoever is going to get up must go up on their ladder. There isn't any other ladder. There isn't an interest, not a body of men in these whole United States that they can't control; and I tell you, Clayton, you might as well throw ashes into the teeth of the north wind as undertake to fight their influence. Now, if there ~~was~~ any hope of doing any good by this, if there was the least prospect of succeeding, why, I'd join in with you. But there isn't. The thing is a fixed fact, and why shouldn't I climb up on it as well as everybody else?'

* This refers to the clause in the United States' Constitution, which allows three slaves to be reckoned as one free man in the census of the representative population.

'Nothing is fixed,' said Clayton, 'that isn't fixed in right. God and nature fight against evil.'

'They do, I suppose, but it's a long campaign,' said Frank, 'and I must be on the side that will win while I'm alive. Now, Clayton, to you I always speak the truth, I won't humbug you; I worship success; I am of Frederick the Great's creed, "that Providence goes with the strongest battalion." I wasn't made for defeat; I must have power. The preservation of this system whole and entire is to be the policy of the leaders of this generation. The fact is they stand where it must be their policy. They must spread it over the whole territory. They must get the balance of power in the country to build themselves up against the public opinion of mankind. Why, Clayton, moral sentiment, as you call it, is a humbug! The whole world acquiesces in what goes—they always have. There is a great outcry about slavery now, but let it succeed, and there won't be.' When they can outvote the northern states, they'll put them down. They have kept them subservient by intrigue so far, and by-and-by they'll have the strength to put them down by force. England makes a fuss now, but let them only succeed, and she'll be civil as a sheep. Of course, men always make a fuss about injustice when they have nothing to gain by holding their tongues, but England's mouth will be stopped with cotton; you'll see it. They love trade and hate war. And so the fuss of anti-slavery will die out in the world. Now, when you see what a poor hoax human nature is, what's the use of bothering! The whole race together ar'n't worth a button, Clayton, and self-sacrifice for such fools is a humbug. That's my programme.'

'Well, Frank, you have made a clean breast, so will I. The human race, as you say, may be a humbug, but it's every man's duty to know for himself that he isn't one. I am not. I do not worship success, and will not. And if a cause is a right and honourable one, I will labour in it till I die, whether there is any chance of succeeding or not.'

'Well, now,' said Frank Russel, 'I dare say it's so. I respect your sort of folks. You form an agreeable heroic poem with which one can amuse the tediousness of life. I suppose it won't do you any good to tell you that you are getting immensely unpopular with what you are doing?'

'No,' said Clayton; 'it won't.'

'I am really afraid,' said Russel, 'that they'll mob you some of these bright days.'

'Very well,' said Clayton.

'Oh, of course, I knew it would be very well. But say, Clayton, what do you want to get up a petition on that point for? Why don't you get up one to prevent the separation of families. There's been such a fuss made about that in Europe and all round the world, that it is rather the fashion to move about that a little. Politicians like to appear to intend to begin to do something about it. It has a pleasing effect, and gives the northern editors and ministers something to say as an apology for our sins. Besides, there's a good many simple-hearted folks who don't see very deep into things, that really think it's possible to do something effective on this subject. If you get up a petition for that you might take the tide with you, and I'd do something about it myself.'

'You know very well, Frank, for I told you, that it's no use to pass laws for that without giving the slave power to sue or give evidence in case of violation. The improvement I propose touches the root of the matter.'

'That's the fact, it surely does,' said Russel; 'and for that very reason you'll never carry it. Now, Clayton, I just want to ask you one question. Can you fight? Will you fight? Will you wear a bowie-knife and pistol, and shoot every fellow down that comes at you?'

'Why, no, of course, Frank, you know that I never was a fighting man. Such brute ways are not to my taste.'

'Then, my dear sir, you shouldn't set up for a reformer in southern states. Now, I'll tell you one thing, Clayton, that I've heard. You made some remarks at a public meeting up at E—that have started a mad-dog cry, which I suppose came from Tom Gordon. See here; have you noticed this article in the "Trumpet of Liberty?"' said he, looking over a confused stack of papers on his table. 'Where's the article? Oh, here it is.'

At the same time he handed Clayton a sheet bearing the motto 'Liberty and union now and for ever one and inseparable,' and he pointed to an article headed—

'COVERT ABOLITIONISM.

'CITIZENS, BEWARE.

'We were present a few evenings ago at the closing speech delivered before the Washington Agricultural Society, in the course of which the speaker, Mr. Edward Clayton, gratuitously wandered away from his subject to make inflammatory and seditious comments on the state of the laws which regulate our negro population. It is time for the friends of our institutions to be awake. Such remarks, dropped in the ear of a restless and ignorant population, will be a fruitful source of sedition and insurrection. This young man is supposed to be infected with the virus of northern abolitionists. We cannot too narrowly watch the course of such individuals. For the only price at which we can maintain liberty is eternal vigilance. Mr. Clayton belongs to one of our oldest and most respected families, which makes his conduct the more inexcusable.'

Clayton perused this with a quiet smile, which was usual with him.

'The hand of Joab is in that thing,' said Frank Russel.

'I'm sure I said very little,' said Clayton: 'I was only showing the advantage to our agriculture of a higher tone of moral feeling among our labourers; which, of course, led me to speak of the state of the law regulating them. I said nothing but what everybody knows.'

'But don't you know, Clayton,' said Russel, 'that if a fellow has an enemy, anybody bearing him the least ill-will, that he puts a tremendous power in his hands by making such remarks. Why our common people are so ignorant, that they are in the hands of anybody who wants to use them. They are just like a swarm of bees; you can manage them by beating on a tin pan. And Tom Gordon has got the tin pan now I fancy. Tom intends to be a swell. He is a born bully and he'll lead a rabble. And so you must take care. Your family is something in your favour, but after all it won't stand you instead of everything. Who have you got to back you? Who have you talked with?'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'I have talked with some of the ministry.'

'And, of course,' said Frank, 'you found that the leadings of Providence didn't indicate that they are to be martyrs. You have their prayers in secret I presume. And if you ever get the cause on the upper hill side, they'll come out and preach a sermon for you. Now, Clayton, I'll tell you what I'll do. If Tom Gordon attacks you I'll pick a quarrel with him, and shoot him right off the reel. My stomach isn't nice about those matters, and that sort of thing won't compromise me with my party.'

'Thank you,' said Clayton, 'I shall not trouble you.'

'My dear fellow,' said Russel, 'you philosophers are very much mistaken about the use of carnal weapons. As long as you wrestle with flesh and blood you had better use fleshy means. At any rate a gentlemanly brace of pistols won't hurt you; and in fact, Clayton, I am serious you must wear pistols, there are no two ways about it, because if these fellows know that a man wears pistols, and will use them, it keeps them off. They have an objection to being shot, as this is all the world they are likely to have. And I think, Clayton, you can fire off a pistol in as edifying and dignified a manner as you can say a grace on proper occasions. The fact is, before long, there will be a row kicked up, I'm pretty sure of it. Tom Gordon is a deeper fellow than you'd think, and he has booked himself for Congress, and he means to go in on the thunder-and-blazes principle, which will give him the vote of all the rabble. He'll go into Congress to do the fighting and slashing—there always must be a bully or two there you know to knock down fellows that you can't settle any other way. And nothing would suit him better to get his name up than heading a crusade against an abolitionist.'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'if it's come to that that we can't speak and discuss freely in our own state, where are we?'

'Where are we, my dear fellow?—why I know where we are, and if you don't it's time you did. Discuss freely? Certainly, we can on one side of the question, or on both sides of any other question than this. But this you can't discuss freely; and they can't afford to let you as long as they mean to keep their power. Do you suppose they are going to let these poor devils (whites) get the bandages off their eyes, that make them so easy to lead now? There would be a pretty bill to pay if they did. Just now these fellows are in a safe and comfortable condition for use as a party could desire, because they have votes and we have the guiding of them. And they rage, and swear, and tear, for our institutions, because they are fools and don't know what hurts them. Then there's the niggers. Those fellows are deep. They have as long ears as little pitchers, and they are such a sort of fussy set, that whatever is going on in the community is always in their mouths, and so comes up that old fear of insurrection. That's the awful word, Clayton! that lies at the bottom of a good many things in our states, more than we choose to let on. These negroes are a black well, you never know what's at the bottom.'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'the only way, the only safeguard to prevent this is reform. They are a patient set, and will bear a great while, and if they only see that anything is being done, it will be an effectual prevention. If you want insurrection, the only way is to shut down the escape-valve, for, will ye nill ye, the steam must rise. You see in this day minds will grow; they are growing. There's no help for it; and there's no force like the force of growth. I have seen a rock split in two by the growing of an elm tree that wanted light and air, and would make way up through it. Look at all the aristocracies of Europe. They have gone down under this force. Only one has stood, that of England; and how came that to stand? Because it knew when to yield; because it never confined discussion; because it gave way gracefully before the growing force of the people. That's the reason it stands to-day, while the aristocracy of France has been blown to atoms.'

'My dear fellow,' said Russel, 'this is all very true and convincing, no doubt, but you won't make our aristocracy believe it. They have mounted the lightning, and they are going to ride it, whip and spur. They are going to annex Cuba and the Sandwich Islands, and the Lord knows what, and have a great and splendid slaveholding empire: and the North is going to be what Greece was to Rome. We shall govern it, and it will attend to the arts of life for us. The South understands governing. We are trained to rule from the cradle; we have leisure to rule—we have nothing else to do. The free states have their factories, and their warehouses, and their schools, and their internal improvements to take up their minds; and if we are careful, and don't tell them too plainly where we are taking them, they'll never know it till they get there.'

'Well,' said Clayton, 'there's one element of force that you've left out in your calculation.'

'And what's that?' said Russel.

'God,' said Clayton.

'I don't know anything about Him,' said Russel.

'You may have occasion to learn one of these days,' said Clayton; 'I believe He lives.'

CHAPTER XLVII.

TOM GORDON'S PLANS.

TOM GORDON, in the meanwhile, had commenced ruling his paternal plantation in a manner very different from the former indulgent system. His habits of reckless and boundless extravagance, and utter heedlessness, causing his cravings for money to be absolutely insatiable; and, within legal limits, he had as little care how it was come by, as a highway robber. It is to be remarked that Tom Gordon was a worse slaveholder and master from the very fact of certain desirable qualities in his mental constitution; for as good wine makes the strongest vinegar, so fine natures perverted make the worse vice. Tom had naturally a perfectly clear, perceptive mind, and an energetic, prompt temperament. It was impossible for him, as many do, to sophisticate, and delude himself with false views. He marched up to evil boldly and with his eyes open. He had very little regard for public opinion, particularly the opinion of conscientious and scrupulous people. So he carried his purposes, it was very little matter to him what any one thought of them or him. They might complain till they were tired. After Clayton had left the place, he often pondered the dying words of Nina, 'that he should care for her people; and that he should tell Tom to be kind to them.' There was such an impassable gulf between the two characters, that it seemed impossible that any peaceable communication should pass between them. Clayton thought within himself that it was utterly hopeless to expect any good to arise from the sending of Nina's last message. But the subject haunted him. Had he any right to withhold it? Was it not his duty to try every measure, however apparently hopeless? Under the impulse of this feeling, he one day sat down and wrote to Tom Gordon an account, worded with the utmost simplicity, of the last hours of his sister's life, hoping that he might read it, and thus, if nothing more, his own conscience be absolved. Death and the grave, it is true, have sacred prerogatives, and it is often in their power to awaken a love which did not appear in life. There are few so hard as not to be touched by the record of the last hours of those with whom they have stood in intimate relations. A great moralist says, 'There are few things not purely evil, of which we can say, without emotion, this is the last.' The letter was brought to Tom Gordon one evening, when, for a wonder, he was by himself; his associates being off on an excursion, while he was detained at home by a temporary illness. He read it over, therefore, with some attention. He was of too positive a character, however, too keenly percipient not to feel immediate pain in view of it. A man of another nature might have melted in tears over it, indulged in the luxury of sentimental grief, and derived some comfort from the exercise to go on in ways of sin. Not so with Tom Gordon. He could not afford to indulge in anything that roused his moral nature. He was doing wrong of set purpose, with defiant energy; and his only way of keeping his conscience quiet was to maintain about him such a constant tumult of excitement as should drown reflection. He could not afford a tête-à-tête conversation with his conscience: having resolved, once for all, to go on in his own wicked way, serving the flesh and the devil, he had to watch against anything that might occasion uncomfortable conflict in his mind. He knew very well, lost man as he was, that there was something sweet and pure, high and noble, against which he was contending; and the letter was only like a torch, which a fair angel might hold up, shining into the filthy lair of a demon. He could not bear the light, and he had no sooner read the note than he cast it into the fire, and rang violently for a hot brandy-toddy, and a fresh case of cigars. The devil's last, best artifice, to rivet the fetters of his captives, is the opportunity which these stimulants give them to command insanity at will.

Tom Gordon was taken to bed drunk; and if a sorrowful guardian spirit hovered over him as he read the letter, he did not hear the dejected rustle of its retreating wings. The next day nothing was left, only a more decided antipathy to Clayton for having occasioned him so disagreeable a sensation.

Tom Gordon, on the whole, was not unpopular in his vicinity. He determined to rule them all, and he did. All that uncertain, uninstructed, vagrant population which abound in slave states, were at his nod and beck. They were his tools; prompt to aid him in any of his purposes, and convenient to execute vengeance on his adversaries. Tom was a determined slaveholder. He had ability enough to see the whole bearings of that subject, from the beginning to the end, and he was determined, that while he lived, the first stone should never be pulled from the edifice in his state. He was a formidable adversary, because what he wanted in cultivation he made up in unscrupulous energy, and where he might have failed in argument he could conquer by the cudgel and the bludgeon. He was, as Frank Russel had supposed, the author of the paragraph which had appeared in the Trumpet of Freedom, which had already had its effect in awakening public suspicion. But what stung him to frenzy when he thought of it was, that every effort which he had hitherto made to recover possession of Harry had failed. In vain he had sent out hunters and dogs. The swamp had been tracked in vain. He boiled and burned with fierce tides of passion as he thought of him in his security defying his power. Some vague rumours had fallen upon his ear of the existence in the swamp of a negro conspirator of great energy and power, whose lair had never yet been discovered, and he determined that he would raise heaven and earth to find him. He began to suspect that there was, somehow, understanding and communication between Harry and those who were left on the plantation, and he determined to detect it. This led to the scene of cruelty and tyranny to which we made allusion in a former chapter. The mangled body was buried, and Tom felt neither remorse nor shame. Why should he, protected by the express words of legal decision? He had only met with an accident in the exercise of his lawful power on a slave in the act of rebellion.

'The fact is, Kite,' he said to his boon-companion, Theophilus Kite, as they were one day sitting together, 'I'm bound to have that fellow. I'm going to publish a proclamation of outlawry, and offer a reward for his head. That will bring it in, I'm thinking. I'll put it up to a handsome figure, for that will be better than nothing.'

'Pity you couldn't catch him alive,' said Kite, 'and make an example of him.'

'I know it,' said Tom; 'I'd take him the long way round, that I would. That fellow has been an eyesore to me ever since I was a boy. I believe all the devils that are in me are up about him.'

'Tom,' said Kite, 'you've got the devil in you—no mistake!'

'To be sure I have,' said Tom. 'I only want a chance to express him. I wish I could get hold of the fellow's wife; I could make him wince there, I guess. I'll get her, too, one of these days! But now, Kite, I'll tell you, the fact is, that somebody round here is in league with him. They know about him, I know they do. There's that squeaky, leathery, long-nosed Skinflint trades with the niggers in the swamp—I know he does. But he is a double-and-twisted liar, and you can't get anything out of him. One of these days I'll burn up that old den of his, and shoot him, if he don't look out! Jim Stokes told me that he slept down there one night when he was tracking, and that he heard Skinflint talking with somebody between twelve and one o'clock; and he looked out and saw him selling powder to a nigger.'

'O, that couldn't be Harry,' said Kite.

'No, but it's one of the gang that he is in with. And then, there's that Hark. Jim says that he saw him talking,—giving a letter that he got out of the post-office to a man that rode off towards the woods. I thought we'd have the truth out of his old hide! But he didn't hold out as I thought he would.'

'Hokum don't understand his business,' said Kite. 'He shouldn't have used him up so fast.'

'Hokum is a bother,' said Tom, 'like all the rest of those fellows. Hark was a desperately-resolute fellow, and it's well enough he is dead, because he was getting sullen, and making the others rebellious. Hokum, you see, had taken a fancy to his wife, and Hark was jealous.'

'Quite a romance!' said Kite, laughing.

'And now I'll tell you another thing,' said Tom, 'that I'm bound to reform. There's a canting, sneaking, dribbling, whining old priest, that's ravaging these parts, and getting up a muss among people about the abuses of the slaves; and I'm not going to have it. I'm going to shut up his mouth. I shall inform him pretty succinctly, that, if he does much more in this region, he'll be illustrated with a coat of tar and feathers.'

'Good for you!' said Kite.

'Now,' said Tom, 'I understand that to-night he is going to have a general snivelling season in the old log-church, out on the cross run, and they are going to form a church on anti-slavery principles. Contemptible whelps! Not a copper to bless themselves with! Think of the impudence of their getting together, and passing anti-slavery resolutions, and resolving they won't admit slaveholders to the communion!

'Are they really going to form such a church?'

'That's the talk,' said Tom. 'But they'll find they have reckoned without their host, I fancy! You see, I just tipped Jim Stokes the wink. Says I, "Jim, don't you think they'll want you to help the music, there, to-night?" Jim took at once, and he said he would be on the ground with a dog or two, and some old tin pans. O, we shall get them up an orchestra, I promise you! And some of our set are going over to see the fun. There's Bill Akers, and Bob Story, and Sim Dexter, will be over here to dinner, and towards evening we'll ride over.'

CHAPTER XLVIII.

LYNCH LAW.

THE rays of the afternoon sun were shining through the fringy needles of the pines. The sound of the woodpecker reverberated through the stillness of the forest, answering to thousand woodland notes. Suddenly, along the distant path, a voice is heard singing, and the sound comes strangely on the ear, through the dreamy stillness:—

‘ Jesus Christ has lived and died—
 What is all the world beside?
 This to know is all I need,
 This to know is life indeed,
 Other wisdom seek I none,
 Teach me this, and this alone—
 Christ for me has lived and died,
 Christ for me was crucified !’

And as the last lines fall upon the ear, a figure, riding slowly on horseback, comes round the bend of the forest path. It is father Dickson. It was the habit of this good man, much of whose life was spent in solitary journeyings, to use the forest arches for that purpose for which they seemed so well designed, as a great cathedral of prayer and praise. He was riding with the reins loose over the horse’s neck, and a pocket Bible in his hand. Occasionally he broke out into snatches of song, like the one which we heard him singing a few moments ago. As he rides along now, he seems absorbed in mental prayer. Father Dickson in truth had cause to pray. The plainness of speech which he felt bound to use had drawn down upon him opposition and opprobrium, and alienated some of his best friends. The support which many had been willing to contribute to his poverty was entirely withdrawn. His wife, in feeble health, was toiling daily beyond her strength; and hunger had looked in at the door, but each day prayer had driven it away. The petition, ‘ Give us THIS DAY our daily bread,’ had not yet failed to bring an answer; but there was no bread for to-morrow. Many friendly advisers had told him that, if he would relinquish a futile and useless undertaking, he should have enough and to spare. He had been conferred with by the elders in a vacant church, in the town of E——, who said to him,—

'We enjoy your preaching when you let alone controverted topics; and if you'll agree to confine yourself solely to the gospel, and say nothing on any of the delicate and exciting subjects of the day, we shall rejoice in your ministrations.'

They pleaded with him his poverty, and the poor health of his wife, and the necessities of his children; but he answered,— “Man shall not live by bread alone!” God is able to feed me, and He will do it.’

They went away, saying that he was a fool, that he was crazy. He was not the first whose brethren had said, ‘he is beside himself.’ As he rode along through the forest path, he talked of his wants to his Master:—

‘Thou knowest,’ he said, ‘how I suffer! Thou knowest how feeble my poor wife is, and how it distresses us both to have our children grow up without education! We cast ourselves on Thee. Let us not deny Thee! let us not betray Thee! Thou hadst not where to lay Thy head—let us not murmur! “The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord.”’ And then he sang:—

‘Jesus, I my cross have taken,
All to leave and follow thee;
Naked, poor, despised, forsaken,
Thou my all henceforth shalt be!

‘Let the world despise and leave me,
They have left my Saviour too;
Human looks and words deceive me,
Thou art not, like them, untrue!

‘And, while thou shalt smile upon me,
God of wisdom, power, and might,
Foes may hate, and friends disown me,
Show thy face and all is bright!’

And, as he sang and prayed, that strange joy arose within him, which, like the sweetness of night-flowers, is born of darkness and tribulation. The soul hath in it somewhat of the divine, in that it can have joy in endurance beyond the joy of indulgence. They mistake, who suppose that the highest happiness lies in wishes accomplished—in prosperity, wealth, favour, and success. There has been a joy in dungeons and on racks, passing the joy of harvest. A joy strange and solemn, mysterious even to its possessor. A white stone dropped from that signet-ring, peace, which a dying Saviour took from his own bosom, and bequeathed to those who endure the cross, despising the shame.

As father Dickson rode on, he lifted his voice in solemn exultation—

‘Soul, then, know thy full salvation;
Rise o’er fear, and doubt, and care;
Joy to find in every station
Something still to do or bear.
Think what spirit dwells within thee;
Think what Father’s smiles are thine;
Think that Jesus died to win thee;
Child of heaven, wilt thou repine?’

At this moment, Dr. Cushing, in the abundant comforts of his home, might have envied father Dickson in his desertion and poverty, for that peace seldom visited him. He struggled wearily along the paths of duty, never fulfilling his highest ideal; wearied by confusing accusations of conscience, and deeming himself happy only, because having never lived in any other state, he knew not what happiness was like. He alternately condemned his brother’s rashness, and sighed as he thought of his uncompromising spirituality; and once or twice he had written him a friendly letter of caution, enclosing him a five-dollar bill, wishing that he might succeed, begging that he would be careful, and ending with the pious wish, that we might all be guided aright, which supplication, in many cases, answers the purpose in a man’s inner legislation, of laying troublesome propositions on the table.

Meanwhile, the shades of evening drew on, and father Dickson approached the rude church which stood deep in the shadow of the woods. In external appearance, it had not the pretensions even of a New England barn, but still it had echoed prayers and praises from humble, sincere worshippers.

As father Dickson rode up to the door, he was surprised to find quite a throng of men, armed with bludgeons and pistols, waiting before it. One of these now stepped forward, and handing him a letter, said—

‘Here, I have a letter for you to read.’

Father Dickson put it calmly in his pocket.

‘I will read it after service,’ said he.

The man then laid hold of his bridle.

‘Come out here!’ he said, ‘I want to talk to you.’

‘Thank you, friend, I will talk with you after meeting,’ said he, ‘it’s time for me to begin service.’

‘The fact is,’ said a surly, wolfish-looking fellow, who came behind the first speaker, ‘the fact is, we ain’t going to have any of your d——d abolition meetings here! If he can't get it out, I can.'

'Friends,' said father Dickson, mildly, 'by what right do you presume to stop me?'

'We think,' said the first man, 'that you are doing harm, violating the laws.'

'Have you any warrant from the civil authorities to stop me?'

'No, sir,' said the first speaker. But the second one, ejecting a large quid of tobacco from his mouth, took up the explanation in a style and taste peculiarly his own:—

'Now, old cock, you may as well know first as last, that we don't care a cuss for the civil authorities, as you call them, 'cause we's going to do what we darn please; and we don't please have you yowping abolishment round here, and putting devilry in the heads of our niggers. Now, that ar's plain talk!'

This speech was chorused by a group of men on the steps, who now began to gather round and shout, 'Give it to him! That's into him! Make the wool fly!'

Father Dickson, who was perfectly calm, now remarked in the shadow of the wood, at no great distance, three or four young men mounted on horses, who laughed brutally, and called out to the speaker, 'Give him some more!'

'My friends,' said father Dickson, 'I came here to perform a duty, at the call of my heavenly Master, and you have no right to stop me.'

'Well, how will you help yourself, old bird, supposing we haven't?'

'Remember, my friends, that we shall all stand side by side at the judgment-seat to give an account for this night's transaction. How will you answer for it to God?'

A loud, sneering laugh came from the group under the trees, and a voice, which we recognise as Tom Gordon's, calls out,

'He is coming the solemn dodge on you, boys! Get on your long faces!'

'Come,' said the roughest of the speakers, 'this here don't go down with us. We don't know nothing about no judgments, and as to God, we an't none of us seen him lately. We 'spect he don't travel round these parts.'

'The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good,' said father Dickson.

Here one of the mob mewed like a cat; another barked like a dog, and the spectators under the tree laughed more loudly than ever

'I say,' said the first speaker, 'you shan't go to getting up rat-traps, and calling 'em meetings! This yer preaching o' yours is a cussed sell, and we won't stand it no longer! We shall have an insurrection among our niggers! Pretty business, getting up churches where you won't have slaveholders cominune! I've got niggers myself, and I know I've bigger slave than they be, and I wished I was shot of them; but I an't going to have no d—d old parson dictating to me about my affairs! And we won't, none of the rest of us, will we? 'Cause them that an't got niggers now means to have, don't we, boys?'

'Ay, ay, that we do! Give it to him!' was shouted from the party.

'It's our right to have niggers, and we will have them, if we can get them,' continued the speaker.

'Who gave you the right?' said father Dickson.

'Who gave it? Why, the constitution of the United States, to be sure, man! Who did you suppose? An't we got the freest government in the world? Is we going to be shut out of communion because we holds niggers? Don't care for your communion, but it's the principle I've going for! Now I tell you what, old fellow, we've got you; and you have got to promise, right off the reel, that you won't say another word on this yer subject.'

'Friend, I shall make no such promise,' said father Dickson, in a tone so mild and steadfast, that there was a momentary pause.

'You'd better,' said a man in the crowd, 'if you know what's good for you.'

A voice now spoke from the circle of the young men. 'Never cave in, boys!'

'No fear of us!' responded the man who had taken the most prominent part in the dialogue hitherto. 'We'll serve it out to him! Now ye see, old feller, ye're tree'd, and may as well come down, as the coon said to Davy. You can't help yourself, 'cause we are ten to one; and if you don't promise peaceable, we'll make you!'

'My friends,' said father Dickson, 'I want you to think what you are doing. Your good sense must teach you the impropriety of your course. You know that you are doing wrong. You know that it isn't right to trample on all law, both human and divine, out of professed love to it. You must see that your course will lead to perfect anarchy and confusion. The time may come when your opinions will be as unpopular as mine.'

‘Well, what then?’

‘Why, if your course prevails, you must be lynched, stoned, tarred and feathered. This is a two-edged sword you are using, and some day you may find the edge turned towards you. You may be seized, just as you are seizing me. You know the men that throw Daniel into the den, got thrown in themselves.’

‘Daniel who?’ shouted one of the company, and the young men under the tree laughed insultingly.

‘Why are you afraid to let me preach this evening?’ said father Dickson. ‘Why can’t you hear me, and, if I say anything false, why can’t you show me the falsehood of it? It seems to me it’s a weak cause that can only get along by stopping men’s mouths.’

‘No, no, we an’t going to have it!’ said the man who had taken the most active part. ‘And now you’ve got to sign a solemn promise, this night, that you won’t ever open your mouth again about this here subject, or we’ll make it worse for you!’

‘I shall never make such a promise. You need not think to terrify me into it, for I’m not afraid. You must kill me before you can stop me.’

‘D—n you, then, old man,’ said one of the young men, riding up by the side of him, ‘I’ll tell you what you shall do! You shall sign a pledge to leave North Carolina in three days, and never come back again, and take your whole spawn and litter with you, or you shall be chastised for your impudence! Now, look out, sir, for you are speaking to your betters! Your insolence is intolerable! What business have you passing strictures reflecting on the conduct of gentlemen of family? Think yourself happy that we let you go out of the state without the punishment that your impudence deserves!’

‘Mr. Gordon, I am sorry to hear you speaking in that way,’ said father Dickson, composedly. ‘By right of your family, you certainly ought to know how to speak as a gentleman. You are holding language to me that you have no right to hold, and uttering threats that you have no means of enforcing.’

‘You’ll see if I haven’t!’ replied the other, with an oath, ‘Here, boys!’ He beckoned one or two of the leaders to his side, and spoke with them in a low voice. One of them seemed inclined to remonstrate.

‘No, no, it’s too bad,’ he said.

But, the other said, ‘Yes, it serves him right! We’ll do it! Hurra, boys! We’ll help on the parson home, and help him kindle his fire!’

There was a general shout, as the whole party, striking up a ribald song, seized father Dickson's horse, turned him round, and began marching in the direction of his cabin in the woods. Tom Gordon and his companions, who rode foremost, filled the air with blasphemous and obscene songs, which entirely drowned the voice of father Dickson whenever he attempted to make himself heard. Before they started, Tom Gordon had freely distributed whiskey amongst them, so that what little manliness there might have been within seemed to be 'set on fire of hell.' It was one of those moments that try men's souls. Father Dickson, as he was hurried along, thought of that other one, who was led by an infuriated mob through the streets of Jerusalem, and he lifted his heart in prayer to the apostle and high priest of his profession, the God in Jesus. When they arrived before his little cabin, he made one more effort to arrest their attention. 'My brethren,' he said—

'None of your brethren! stop that cant!' said Tom Gordon.

'Hear me one word,' said father Dickson. 'My wife is quite feeble. I'm sure you would not wish to hurt a sick woman, who never did harm to any mortal creature?'

'Well, then,' said Tom Gordon, facing round to him, 'if you care so very much about your wife, you can very easily save her any further trouble. Just give us the promise we want, and we'll go away peaceably, and leave you; but if you won't, as true as there is a God in heaven, we'll pull down every stick of timber in your old kennel! I'll tell you what, old man, you've got a master to deal with now!'

'I cannot promise not to preach upon this subject.'

'Well, then, you must promise to take yourself out of the state. You can go among your northern brethren, and howl and mawl round there; but we are not going to have you here. I have as much respect for respectable ministers of the gospel as any one, when they confine themselves to the duties of their calling; but, when they come down to be intriguing in our worldly affairs, they must expect to be treated as we treat other folks that do that. Their black coats shan't protect them. We are not going to be priest-ridden, are we, boys?'

A loud whoop of inflamed and drunken merriment chorused this question. Just at this moment the door of the cottage was opened, and a pale, sickly-looking woman came gliding out to the gate.

'My dear,' she said, and her voice was perfectly calm, 'don't yield a hair's-breadth on my account! I can bear as well as you. I am not afraid. I am ready to die for conscience' sake: gentlemen,' she said, 'there is not much in this house of any value except two sick children. If it is agreeable to you to pull it down, you can do it. Our goods are hardly worth spoiling, but you can spoil them. My husband, be firm, don't yield an inch!' It is one of the worst curses of slavery that it effaces from the breast all manly feeling with regard to woman. Every one remembers the story how the frail and delicate wife of Lovejoy placed her weakness as a shield before the chamber-door where her husband was secreted, and was fought with brutal oaths and abuse by the drunken gang who were determined to pass over her body, if necessary, to his heart! They who are trained to whip women in a servile position of course can have none of the respect which a freeman feels for woman as woman. They respect the sex when they see it enshrined by fashion, wealth, and power; but they tread it in dust when in poverty and helplessness it stands in the path of their purposes.

'Woman,' said Tom Gordon, 'you are a fool! You needn't think to come it round us with any of that talk. You needn't think we are going to stop on your account, for we shan't. We know what we are about.'

'So does God!' said the woman, fixing her eye upon him with one of those sudden looks of power with which a noble sentiment for a moment sometimes lights up the weakest form.

There was a momentary pause, and then Tom broke out into oaths and curses.

'I'll tell you what, boys,' he said, 'we had better bring matters to a point. Here, tie him up to this tree, and give him six-and-thirty. He is so dreadful fond of the niggers, let him fare with them. We know how to get a promise out of him.'

The tiger was now fully awake in the crowd. Wild cries and oaths of 'Give it to him!' 'Give it to him!' 'G—d d—m him!' arose.

Father Dickson stood calm; and beholding him, they 'saw his face as it had been that of an angel,' 'and they gnashed on him with their teeth.' A few moments more, and he was divested of his outer garments and bound to a tree.

'Now, will you promise?' said Tom Gordon, taking out his watch; 'I give you five minutes.'

The children, now aroused, were looking out crying from the door. His wife walked out and took her place before him,

'Stand out of the way, old woman!' said Tom Gordon.

'I will not stand out of the way,' she said, throwing her arms round her husband. 'You shall not get to him but over my body.'

'Ben Hyatt, take her away,' said Tom Gordon; 'treat her decently as long as she behaves herself.'

A man forced her away, she fell fainting on his shoulder.

'Lay her down,' said Tom Gordon. 'Now, sir, your five minutes are up. What have you got to say?'

'I have to say that I shall not comply with your demands.'

'Very well,' said Tom, 'it's best to be explicit.' He drew his horse a little back, and said to a man who was holding a slave whip behind, 'Give it to him.'

The blows descended, he uttered no sound. The mob meanwhile tauntingly insulted him. 'How do you like it? What do you think of it? Preach us a sermon now, can't you? Come, where's your text?'

'He is getting stars and stripes, now,' said one.

'I reckon he'll see stars,' said another.

'Stop,' said Tom Gordon. 'Well, my friend,' he said, 'you see we are in earnest, and we shall carry this through to the bitter end you may rely on it. You won't get any sympathy; you won't get any support. There is not a minister in the state that will stand by you. They all have sense enough to let our affairs alone. They'll any of them hold a candle here, as the good elder did when they thrashed Dresser down at Nashville. Come, now, will you cave in?'

But at this moment the conversation was interrupted by the riding up of four or five gentlemen on horseback, the headmost of whom was Clayton.

'What's this?' he exclaimed, hurriedly. 'What, Mr. Gordon! Father Dickson! What am I to understand by this?'

'Who the devil cares what you understand? It's no business of yours,' said Tom Gordon, 'so stand out of my way!'

'I shall make it some of my business,' said Clayton, turning round to one of his companions. 'Mr. Brown, you are a magistrate?'

Mr. Brown, a florid, puffy-looking old gentleman, now rode forward.

'Bless my soul, but this is shocking! Mr. Gordon, don't! how can you? My boys, you ought to consider!'

Clayton meanwhile had thrown himself off the horse, and cut the cords which bound father Dickson to the tree. The sudden reaction of feeling overcame him. He fell fainting.

‘Are you not ashamed of yourselves?’ said Clayton, indignantly glancing round. ‘Is this business for great strong men like you, abusing ministers that you know won’t fight; and women and children that you know can’t?’

‘Do you mean to apply that language to me?’ said Tom Gordon.

‘Yes, sir, I do mean just that!’ said Clayton, looking at him while he stretched his tall figure to his utmost height.

‘Sir, that remark demands satisfaction.’

‘You are welcome to all the satisfaction you can get from it,’ said Clayton, coolly.

‘You shall meet me,’ said Tom Gordon, ‘where you shall answer for that remark!’

‘I am not a fighting man,’ said Clayton; ‘but if I were, I should never consent to meet any one but my equal. When a man stoops to do the work of a rowdy and a bully, he falls out of the sphere of a gentleman. As for you,’ said Clayton, turning to the rest of the company; ‘there’s more apology for you. You have not been brought up to know better. Take my advice, disperse yourselves now, or I shall take means to have this outrage brought to justice.’

There is often a magnetic force in the appearance amid an excited mob of a man of commanding presence, who seems perfectly calm and decided. The mob stood irresolute.

‘Come, Tom,’ said Kite, pulling him by the sleeve, ‘we’ve given him enough at any rate.’

‘Yes, yes,’ said Mr. Brown. ‘Mr. Gordon, I advise you to go home. We must all keep the peace, you know. Come, boys, you’ve done enough for one night, I should hope, so go home now, and let the old man be; and there’s something to buy you a treat down at Skinslint’s. Come, do the handsome, now.’

Tom Gordon sullenly rode away, with his two associates each side; but before he went he said to Clayton,

‘You shall hear of me again, one of these days.’

‘As you please,’ said Clayton.

The party now set themselves about comforting and recovering the frightened family. The wife was carried in and laid down on her bed. Father Dickson was soon restored, so as to be able to sit up; and, being generally known and respected by the company, received many expressions of sympathy and condolence.

One of the men was an elder in the church which had desired his ministerial services. He thought this a good opportunity of enforcing some of his formerly-expressed opinions.

‘Now, father Dickson,’ he said, ‘this just shows you the truth of what I was telling you. This course of yours won’t do; you see it won’t now. Now, if you’d agree not to say anything of these troublesome matters, and just confine yourself to the preaching of the gospel, you see you wouldn’t get into any more trouble; and after all, it’s the gospel that’s the root of the matter. The gospel will gradually correct all those evils, if you don’t say anything about them. You see the state of the community is peculiar. They won’t bear it. We feel the evils of slavery just as much as you do. Our souls are burdened under it,’ he said, complacently, wiping his face with his handkerchief. ‘But Providence doesn’t appear to open any door here for us to do anything. I think we ought to abide in the patient waiting on the Lord, who, in his own good time will, bring light out of darkness, and order out of confusion.’

This last phrase being part of a stereotyped exhortation with which the good elder was wont to indulge his brethren in church prayer-meetings, he delivered it in the sleepy drawl he reserved for such occasions.

‘Well,’ said father Dickson, ‘I must say, that I don’t see that the preaching of the gospel in the way we have preached it hitherto has done anything to rectify the evil. It’s a bad sign if our preaching does not make a conflict. When the apostles came to a place they said, “These men that turn the world upside down are come hither.”’

‘But,’ said Mr. Brown, ‘you must consider our institutions are peculiar; our negroes are ignorant and inflammable, easily wrought upon, and the most frightful consequences may result. That’s the reason why there is so much sensation when any discussion is begun which relates to them. Now, I was in Nashville when that Dresser affair took place. He hadn’t said a word—he hadn’t opened his mouth, even—but he was known to be an abolitionist; and so they searched his trunks and papers, and there they found documents expressing abolition sentiments, sure enough. Well, everybody, ministers and elders, joined in that affair, and stood by to see him whipped. I thought myself they went too far. But, there’s just where it is. People are not reasonable, and they won’t be reasonable, in such cases. It’s too much to ask of them; and so everybody ought to be cautious. Now, I wish, for my part, that ministers would confine themselves to their appropriate duties. "Christ's kingdom is not of this world." And, then, you don't know Tom Gordon. He is a terrible fellow! I never want to come in conflict with him. I thought I'd put the best face on it and persuade him away. I didn't want to make Tom Gordon my enemy. And I think, Mr. Dickson, if you must preach these doctrines, I think it would be best for you to leave the state. Of course, we don't want to restrict any man's conscience; but when any kind of preaching excites brawls and confusion, and inflames the public mind, it seems to be a duty to give it up.'

'Yes,' said Mr. Cornet, the elder, 'we ought to follow the things which make for peace—such things whereby one may edify another.'

'Don't you see, gentlemen,' said Mr. Clayton, 'that such a course is surrendering our liberty of free speech into the hands of a mob? If Tom Gordon may dictate what is to be said on one subject, he may on another; and the rod which has been held over our friend's head to-night, may be held over ours. Independent of the right or wrong of father Dickson's principles, he ought to maintain his position, for the sake of maintaining the right of free opinion in the state.'

'Why,' said Mr. Cornet, 'the Scripture saith, "If they persecute you in one city, flee ye unto another!"'

'That was said,' said Clayton, 'to a people that lived under despotism, and had no rights of liberty given them to maintain. But, if we give way before mob-law, we make ourselves slaves of the worst despotism on earth.'

But Clayton spoke to men whose ears were stopped by the cotton of slothfulness and love of ease. They rose up, and said; it was time for them to be going. Clayton expressed his intention of remaining over the night, to afford encouragement and assistance to his friends, in case of any further emergency.

CHAPTER XLIX.

MORE VIOLENCE.

CLAYTON rose the next morning, and found his friends much better than he had expected, after the agitation and abuse of the night before. They seemed composed and cheerful.

'I am surprised,' he said, 'to see that your wife is able to be up this morning!'

'They that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength,' said father Dickson. 'How often I have found it so! We have seen times when I and my wife have both been so ill, that we scarcely thought we had strength to help ourselves; and a child has been taken ill, or some other emergency has occurred that called for immediate exertion, and we have been to the Lord and found strength. Our way has been hedged up many a time—the sea before us, and the Egyptians behind us; but the sea has always opened when we have stretched our hands to the Lord. I have never sought the Lord in vain. He has allowed great troubles to come upon us; but he always delivers us.'

Clayton recalled the sneering, faithless, brilliant Frank Russel, and compared him in his own mind with the simple, honest man before him.

'No,' he said to himself, 'human nature is not a humbug, after all. There are some real men. Some who will not acquiesce in what is successful, if it be wrong.'

Clayton was in need of such living examples; for, in regard to religion, he was in that position which is occupied by too many young men of high moral sentiment in this country. What he had seen of the worldly policy and time-serving spirit of most of the organised bodies professing to represent the Christian faith and life had deepened the shadow of doubt and distrust which persons of strong individuality and discriminating minds are apt to feel in certain stages of their spiritual development. Great afflictions—those which tear up the roots of the soul—are often succeeded, in the course of the man's history, by a period of scepticism. The fact is, such afflictions are disenchanting powers; they give to the soul an earnestness and a power of discrimination which no illusion can withstand. They teach us what we need, what we must have to rest upon; and, in consequence, thousands of little formalities, empty shows, and dry religious conventionalities, are scattered by it like chaff. The soul rejects them in her indignant anguish; and finding so much that is insincere, and untrue, and unreliable, she has sometimes hours of doubting all things.

Clayton saw again in the minister what he had seen in Nina—a soul swayed by an attachment to an invisible Person, whose power over it was the power of a personal attachment, and who swayed it not by dogmas or commands merely, but by the force of a sympathetic emotion. Beholding, as in a glass, the divine image of his heavenly Friend, insensibly to himself the minister was changing into the same image. The good and the beautiful to him was an embodied person—even Jesus his Lord.

‘What may be your future course?’ said Clayton, with anxiety. ‘Will you discontinue your labours in this state?’

‘I may do so, if I find positively that there is no gaining a hearing,’ said father Dickson. ‘I think we owe it to our state not to give up the point without a trial. There are those who are willing to hear me—willing to make a beginning with me. It is true that they are poor and unfashionable; but still it is my duty not to desert them till I have tried, at least, whether the laws can’t protect me in the exercise of my duty. The hearts of all men are in the hands of the Lord. He turneth them as the rivers of water are turned. This evil is a great and a crying one. It is gradually lowering the standard of morals in our churches, till men know not what spirit they are of. I held it my duty not to yield to the violence of the tyrant, and bind myself to a promise to leave, till I had considered what the will of my Master would be.’

‘I should be sorry,’ said Clayton, ‘to think that North Carolina couldn’t protect you. I am sure, when the particulars of this are known, there will be a general reprobation from all parts of the country. You might remove to some other part of the state not cursed by the residence of a man like Tom Gordon. I will confer with my uncle, your friend Dr. Cushing, and see if some more eligible situation cannot be found where you can prosecute your labours. He is at this very time visiting his wife’s father in E—, and I will ride over and talk with him to-day. Meanwhile,’ said Clayton, as he rose to depart, ‘allow me to leave with you a little contribution to help the cause of religious freedom in which you are engaged.’

And Clayton, as he shook hands with his friend and his wife, left an amount of money with them such as had not crossed their palms for many a day. Bidding them adieu, a ride of a few hours carried him to E—, where he communicated to Dr. Cushing the incident of the night before.

‘Why, it’s perfectly shocking—abominable!’ said Dr. Cushing. ‘Why, what are we coming to? My dear young friend, this shows the necessity of prayer. “When the enemy cometh in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord must lift up a standard against him.”’

‘My dear uncle,’ said Clayton, rather impatiently, ‘it seems to me the Lord has lifted up a standard in the person of this very man, and people are too cowardly to rally around it.’

‘Well, my dear nephew, it strikes me you are rather excited,’ said Dr. Cushing, good-naturedly.

‘Excited!’ said Clayton. ‘I ought to be excited! You ought to be excited too. Here’s a good man beginning what you think a necessary reform, and who does it in a way perfectly peaceable and lawful, who is cloven down under the hoof of a mob; and all you can think of doing is to pray to the Lord to raise up a standard! What would you think if a man’s house were on fire, and he should sit praying the Lord that in his mysterious providence he would put it out?’

‘Oh, the cases are not parallel,’ said Dr. Cushing.

‘I think they are,’ said Clayton. ‘Our house is the state; and our house is on fire by mob-law; and instead of praying to the Lord to put it out, you ought to go to work and put it out yourself. If all you ministers would make a stand against this, uncle, and do all you can to influence those to whom you are preaching, it wouldn’t be done again.’

‘I am sure I should be glad to do something. Poor father Dickson! such a good man as he is! But then I think, Clayton, he was rather imprudent. It don’t do,—this unadvised way of proceeding. We ought to watch against rashness, I think. We are too apt to be precipitate, and not await the leadings of Providence. Poor Dickson! I tried to caution him the last time I wrote to him. To be sure, it’s no excuse for them; but then, I’ll write to brother Barker on the subject, and we’ll see if we can’t get an article in the “Christian Witness.” I don’t think it would be best to allude to these particular circumstances, or to mention any names. But there might be a general article on the importance of maintaining the right of free speech, and of course people can apply it for themselves.’

‘You remind me,’ said Clayton, ‘of a man who proposed commencing an attack on a shark by throwing a sponge at him. But now, really, uncle, I am concerned for the safety of this good man. Isn’t there any church near you to which he can be called? I heard him at the camp-meeting, and I think he is an excellent preacher.’

‘There are a good many churches,’ said Dr. Cushing, ‘which would be glad of him, if it were not for the course he pursues on that subject, and I really can’t feel that he does right to throw away his influence so. He might be the means of converting souls if he would only be quiet about this.'

'Be quiet about fashionable sins,' said Clayton, 'in order to get a chance to convert souls! What sort of converts are those who are not willing to hear the truth on every subject? I should doubt conversions that can only be accomplished by silence on great practical immoralities.'

'But,' said Dr. Cushing, 'Christ and the apostles didn't preach on the abuses of slavery, and they alluded to it as an existing institution.'

'Nor did they preach on the gladiatorial shows,' said Clayton, 'and Paul draws many illustrations from them. Will you take the principle that everything is to be let alone now, about which the apostles did not preach directly?'

'I don't want to enter into that discussion now,' said Dr. Cushing. 'I believe I'll ride over and see brother Dickson. After all he is a dear good man, and I love him. I'd like to do something for him, if I were not afraid it might be misunderstood.'

Toward evening, however, Clayton becoming uneasy at the lonely situation of his clerical friend, resolved to ride over and pass the night with him, for the sake of protecting him; and arming himself with a brace of pistols, he proceeded on his ride. As the day had been warm, he put off his purpose rather late, and darkness overtook him before he had quite accomplished his journey.

Riding deliberately through the woodland path in the vicinity of the swamp, he was startled by hearing the tramp of horses' hoofs behind him. Three men mounted on horseback were coming up, the headmost of whom, riding up quickly behind, struck him so heavy a blow with a gutta-percha cane as to fell him to the earth.

In an instant, however, he was on his feet again, and had seized the bridle of his horse.

'Who are you?' said he.

For by the dim light that remained of the twilight he could perceive that they all wore masks.

'We are men,' said one of them, whose voice Clayton did not recognize, 'that know how to deal with fellows who insult gentle men, and then refuse to give them honourable satisfaction.'

'And,' said the second speaker, 'we know how to deal with renegade abolitionists, who are covertly undermining our institutions.'

'And,' said Clayton, coolly, 'you understand how to be cowards, for none but cowards would come three to one, and strike a man from behind. Shame on you. Well, gentlemen, act your pleasure. Your first blow has disabled my right arm. If you wish my watch or my purse you may help yourselves, as cut-throats generally do.'

The stinging contempt which was expressed in these last words seemed to enrage the third man, who had not spoken. With a brutal oath he raised his cane again and struck at him.

'Strike a wounded man who cannot help himself, do!' said Clayton; 'show yourself the brute you are. You are brave in attacking defenceless women and children and ministers of the Gospel!'

This time the blow felled Clayton to the earth; and Tom Gordon, precipitating himself from his saddle, proved his eligibility for Congress by beating his defenceless prisoner on the head, after the fashion of the chivalry of South Carolina. But at this moment a violent blow from an unseen hand struck his right arm, and it fell broken at his side. Mad with pain he poured forth volumes of oaths, such as our readers have never heard, and the paper refuses to receive. And a deep voice said from the woods, 'Woe to the bloody and deceitful man!'

'Look for the fellow, where is he?' said Tom Gordon.

The crack of a rifle, and a bullet which passed directly over his head, answered from the swamp. A voice, which he knew was Harry's, called from within the thicket—

'Tom Gordon, beware! Remember Hark!'

At the same time another rifle-shot came over their heads.

'Come, come,' said the other two, 'there's a gang of them. We had better be off. Tom can't do anything with that broken arm there,' and helping Tom into the saddle the three rode away precipitately.

As soon as they were gone, Harry and Dred emerged from the thicket.

The latter was reputed among his people to have some medical and surgical skill. He raised Clayton up, and examined him carefully—

'He is not dead,' he said.

'What shall we do for him?' said Harry. 'Shall we take him along to the minister's cabin?'

'No, no,' said Dred, 'that would only bring the Philistines upon him.'

'It's full five miles to E—,' said Harry. 'It wouldn't do to risk going there.'

'No, indeed,' said Dred. 'We must take him to our stronghold of Engedi, even as Samson bore the gates of Gaza. Our women shall attend him, and when he is healed we will set him on his journey.'

CHAPTER L.

'THE STRONGHOLD OF ENGEDI.'

THE question may occur to our readers, why a retreat which appeared so easily accessible to the negroes of the vicinity in which our story is laid should escape the vigilance of hunters.

In all despotic countries, however, it will be found that the oppressed party becomes expert in the means of secrecy. It is also a fact, that the portion of the community who are trained to labour enjoy all that advantage over the more indolent part of it which can be given by a vigorous physical system, and great capabilities of endurance. Without a doubt the balance of the physical power of the South now lies in the subject race.

Use familiarises the dwellers of the swamp with the peculiarities of their location, and gives them the advantage in it that a mountaineer has in his own mountains. Besides, they who take their life in their hand exercise their faculties with more vigor and clearness than those who have only money at stake, and this advantage the negroes had over the hunters.

Dred's 'stronghold of Engedi,' as we have said, was isolated from the rest of the swamp by some twenty yards of deep morass, in which it was necessary to wade almost to the waist.

The opposite shore presented to the eye only the appearance of an impervious jungle of eat-briar and grape-vine rising out of the water. There was but one spot in which there was a clear place to set foot on, and that was the place where Dred crept up on the night when we first introduced the locality to our reader's attention. The hunters generally satisfied themselves with exploring more apparently accessible portions; and unless betrayed by those to whom Dred had communicated the clue, there was very little chance that any accident would ever disclose the retreat.

Dred himself appeared to be gifted with that peculiar faculty of discernment of spirits which belonged to his father, Denmark Vesey, sharpened into a preternatural intensity by the habits of his wild and dangerous life. The men he selected for trust were men as impenetrable as himself; the most vigorous in mind and body on all the plantations. The perfectness of his own religious enthusiasm, his absolute certainty that he was inspired of God as a leader and deliverer gave him an ascendancy over the minds of those who followed him which nothing but religious enthusiasm ever can inspire. And this was further confirmed by the rigid austerity of his life. For all animal comforts he appeared to entertain a profound contempt. He never tasted strong liquors in any form, and was extremely sparing in his diet; often fasting for days in succession, particularly when he had any movement of importance in contemplation.

It is difficult to fathom the dark recesses of a mind so powerful, and active as his, placed under a pressure of ignorance and social disability so tremendous. In those desolate regions which he made his habitation, it is said that trees often, from the singularly-unnatural and wildly-stimulating properties of the slimy depths from which they spring, assume a strange and goblin growth, entirely different from their normal habit. All sorts of vegetable monsters stretch their weird fantastic forms among its shadows. There is no principle so awful through all nature as this principle of growth. It is a mysterious and dread condition of existence which, place it under what impediment or disadvantage you will, is constantly forcing on, and when unnatural pressures hinder, it develops in forms portentous and astonishing.

The wild, dreary belt of swamp land which girds in those states scathed by the fires of despotism, is an apt emblem in its rampant, and we might say delirious, exuberance of vegetation to that darkly-struggling, wildly-vegetating swamp of human souls—cut off like it from the usages and improvements of cultivated life.

Beneath that fearful pressure, souls, whose energy well directed might have blessed mankind, start out in preternatural and fearful developments, whose strength is only a portent of dread.

The night after the meeting which we have described was one, to the singular being of whom our story treats, of agonising conflict. His psychological condition, as near as we can define it, seemed to be that of a human being who had been seized and possessed, after the manner related in ancient fables, by the wrath of an avenging God. That part of the moral constitution which exists in some degree in us all, which leads us to feel pain at the sight of injustice, and to desire retribution for cruelty and crime, seemed in him to have become an absorbing sentiment, as if he had been chosen by some higher power as the instrument of doom.

At some moments the idea of the crimes and oppressions which had overwhelmed his race, rolled in upon him with a burning pain, which caused him to cry out like the fated and enslaved Cassandra at the threshold of the dark and bloody house of bondage. This sentiment of justice, this agony in view of cruelty and crime, is in men a strong attribute of the highest natures, for the virtue of him who is destitute of the element of moral indignation is effeminate and tame. But there is in nature and in the human heart a pleading, interceding power, which comes in constantly to temper and soften this spirit; and this element in the divine mind the Scriptures represent by the sublime image of an eternally-interceding High Priest, who, having experienced every temptation of humanity, constantly urges all that can be thought in mitigation of eternal justice. As a spotless and high-toned mother bears in her bosom the anguish of the impurity and vileness of her child, so the eternally-suffering—eternally-interceding love of Christ bears the sins of our lost race. But the Scriptures tell us that the mysterious Person who thus stands before all worlds as the image and impersonation of Divine tenderness, has yet in reserve this awful energy of wrath. The oppressors in the last dread day are represented as calling to the mountains and rocks to fall on them, and hide them from the wrath of the LAMB.

This idea had dimly loomed up before the mind of Dred as he read and pondered the mysteries of the sacred oracles, and was expressed by him in the form of language so frequent in his mouth, that ‘the Lamb was bearing the yoke of the sins of men.’ He had been deeply affected by the presentation which Milly had made in their nightly meeting of the eternal principle of intercession and atonement, blindly struggling with the habitual and overmastering sense of oppression and wrong.

When his associates had all dispersed to their dwellings, he threw himself on his face and prayed. ‘Oh, Lamb of God that bearest the yoke! why hast Thou filled me with wrath? Behold the blood of our brother cryeth. Behold these graves—the graves of our brethren slain without mercy, and Lord they do not repent!—Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil—and can'st not look on iniquity.—Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously, and holdest thy tongue when the wicked devoureth the man that is more righteous than he!—They make men as fishes in the sea, as creeping things that have no ruler over them,—they take them up with the angle,—they catch them in their net, and gather them in their drag, therefore they rejoice and are glad.—Therefore they sacrifice unto their net, and burn incense unto their drag, because by them their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous.—Shall they therefore empty their net, and not spare continually to slay the nations?—Did not He that made them in the womb make us?—Did not the same God fashion us in the womb?—Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledgeth us not.—Thou, O God! art our Father, our Redeemer, wherefore forgettest Thou us for ever, and forsakest us so long a time?—Wilt thou not judge between us and our enemies?—Behold there is none among them that stirreth himself up to call upon Thee—and he that departeth from evil, maketh himself a prey.—They lie in wait—they set traps—they catch men—they are waxen fat—they shine—they overpass the deeds of the wicked—they judge not the cause of the fatherless, yet they prosper, and the right of the needy do they not judge.—Wilt thou not visit for these things, O Lord?—Shall not thy soul be avenged on such a nation as this?—How long wilt thou endure?—Behold under the altar the souls of those they have slain.—They cry unto Thee continually.—How long, O Lord! dost thou not judge and avenge?—Is there any that stirreth himself up for justice?—Is there any that regardeth our blood?—We are sold for silver—the price of our blood is in thy treasury—the price of our blood is on thine altars. Behold they build their churches with the price of our hire.—Behold the stone doth cry out of the wall, and the timber doth answer it.—Because they build their towns with blood, and establish their cities by iniquity.—They have all gone one way.—There is none that careth for the spoilings of the poor.—Art thou a just God?—When wilt thou arise, to shake terribly the earth that the Desire of all nations may come?—Overturn—overturn—till He whose right it is shall come!

Such were the words, not uttered continuously, but poured forth at intervals with sobbings and groanings, that could not be uttered, from the recesses of that wild fortress.

It was but a part of that incessant prayer with which oppressed humanity has besieged the throne of justice in all ages.

We who live in ceiled houses, would do well to give heed to that sound, lest it be to us that inarticulate moaning which goes before the earthquake. If we would estimate the force of almighty justice, let us ask ourselves what a mother might feel for the abuse of a helpless child, and multiply that by infinity.

But the night wore on, and the stars looked down serene and solemn, as if no prayer had gone through the calm eternal gloom, — and the morning broke in the east resplendent.

Harry, too, had passed a sleepless night. The death of Hark weighed like a mountain upon his heart. He had known him for a whole-souled, true-hearted fellow. He had been his counsellor and friend for many years, and he had died in silent torture for him. How stinging is it at such a moment, to view the whole respectability of civilised society upholding and glorifying the murderer, calling his sin by soft names, and using for his defence every artifice of legal injustice! Some in our own nation had bitter experience of this, for the freemen of America have begun to drink the cup of trembling, which for so many ages has been drunk alone by the slave.

Let the associates of Brown,* ask themselves if they cannot understand the midnight anguish of Harry!

His own impulses would have urged to an immediate insurrection, in which he was careless about his own life, so the fearful craving of his soul for justice was assuaged. To him, the morning seemed to break red with the blood of his friend. He would have urged to immediate and precipitate action, but Dred, true to the enthusiastic impulses which guided him, persisted in waiting for that sign from heaven which was to indicate that the day of grace was closed and the day of judgment to begin.† This expectation he founded on his own version of certain passages in the Prophets, such as these—

‘I will show wonders in heaven above, and signs in the earth beneath; blood, and fire, and vapour of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord shall come.’

Meanwhile his associates were to be preparing the minds of the people; and he was traversing the swamps in different directions, holding nightly meetings, in which he read and expounded the prophecies to excited ears. The laborious arguments by which northern and southern doctors of divinity have deduced from the Old Testament the divine institution of slavery were too subtle and fine-spun to reach his ear, amid the denunciations of prophets and 'holy men of old,' all turning on the sin of oppression. His instinctive understanding spirit of the Bible justified the sagacity which makes the supporter of slavery to this day careful not to allow the slave the power of judging it for himself; and we leave it to any modern pro-slavery divine, whether, in Dred's circumstances, his own judgment might not have been the same.

After daylight, Harry saw Dred standing with a dejected countenance outside of his hut.

'I have wrestled,' he said, 'for thee, but the time is not yet. Let us abide certain days, for the thing is secret unto me, and I cannot do less nor more till the Lord giveth commandment. When the Lord delivereth them into our hands, one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.'

'After all,' said Harry, 'our case is utterly hopeless. A few poor outcast wretches, without a place to lay our heads, and they all revelling in their splendour and their power. Who is there in this great nation that is not pledged against us?—who would not cry amen if we were dragged out and hung like dogs? The North is as bad as the South; they kill us, and the North consents and justifies, and all their wealth, power, and religion is used against us. We are the ones that all sides are willing to give up—any party in Church or State will throw in our blood and bones as a make-weight, and think nothing of it; and when I see them riding out in their splendid equipages—their houses full of everything that is elegant—they so cultivated and refined, and our people so miserable, poor, and down-trodden—I haven't any faith that there is a God.'

'Stop,' said Dred, laying his hand on his arm, 'hear what the Lord saith: "Their land also is full of silver and gold, neither is there any end of their treasures; their land also is full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots. Their land also is full of idols. They worship the work of their own hands. Enter into the rock!—hide thee in the dust! for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of His majesty! The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of man shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day! for the day of the Lord of Hosts shall be on every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up, and he shall be brought low. And upon all the cedars of Lebanon that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan, and upon all the high mountains, and upon all the high hills that are lifted up, and upon every high tower, and upon every fenced wall, and upon all the ships of Tarshish, and upon all pleasant pictures. And the loftiness of man shall be bowed down, the haughtiness of man shall be-made low; and they shall go in the holes of the rocks and in the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord and for the glory of his majesty, when He ariseth to shake terribly the earth."

The tall pines and whispering oaks, as they stood waving in the purple freshness of the dawn, seemed like broad-winged attesting angels, bearing witness in their serene and solemn majesty to the sublime words,

"Heaven and earth shall not pass away till these words have been fulfilled."

After a few moments, a troubled expression came over the face of Dred

'Harry,' he said, 'verily He is a God that hideth Himself. He giveth none account to any of these matters. It may be that I shall not lead the tribes over this Jordan, but that I shall lay my bones in the wilderness. But the day shall surely come, and the sign of the Son of Man shall appear in the air, and all tribes of the earth shall wail because of Him. Behold, I saw white spirits and black spirits, that contended in the air; and the thunder rolled, and the blood flowed, and the voice said, "Come rough, come smooth—such is the decree; ye must surely bear it. But as yet the prayers of the saints have power, for there be angels having golden censers, which be the prayers of saints; and the Lord by reason thereof delayeth." Behold, I have borne the burden of the Lord even for many years. He hath covered me with a cloud in the day of His anger, and filled me with His wrath, and His word hath been like a consuming fire shut in my bones. He hath held mine eyes waking, and my bones have waxed old with my roaring all the day long. Then I have said, "Oh, that Thou wouldst hide me in the dust! that Thou wouldst keep me secret till Thy wrath be past."'

At this moment, soaring upward through the blue sky, rose the fair form of a wood-pigeon, wheeling and curving in the morning sunlight, cutting the air with aerial flight, smooth, even, and clear as if it had learnt motion from the music of angels. Dred's eyes faded and haggard with his long night-watchings, followed it for a moment with an air of softened pleasure, in which was blent somewhat of weariness and longing.

“Oh, that I had wings like a dove!” he said, “then would I flee away and be at rest.” I would hasten to escape from the windy storm and tempest. Lo, then I would wander far off, and remain in the wilderness.’

There was something peculiar in the power and energy which this man’s nature had of drawing others into the tide of its own sympathies, as a strong ship walking through the water draws all the smaller craft into its current. Harry, melancholy and disheartened as he was, felt himself borne out with him in that impassioned prayer—

‘I know,’ said Dred, ‘that the new heaven and the new earth shall come, and the redeemed of the Lord shall walk in it. But as for me I am a man of unclean lips, and the Lord hath laid on me the oppressions of the people. But though the violent man prevail against me, it shall surely come to pass.’

Harry turned away and walked slowly to the other side of the clearing, where old Tiff, with Fanny, Teddy, and Lisette, having kindled a fire on the ground, were busy in preparing their breakfast. Dred, instead of going into his house, disappeared in the thicket. Milly had gone home with the man who came from Canema.

The next day as Harry and Dred made a hunting excursion through the Swamp, returning home in the edge of the evening, they happened to be passing near the scene of lawless violence which we have already described.

CHAPTER LI.

TOM GORDON AND HIS FRIENDS.

TOM GORDON, for the next two or three days after his injury, was about as comfortable to manage as a wounded hyena. He had a thousand varying caprices every hour and moment—now one and now another prevailed. The miserable girls, who were held by him as his particular attendants, were tormented by every species of annoyance which a restless and passionate man, in his impatience, could devise.

The recent death of Milly’s mistress by the cholera had reduced her under Tom's authority, and she was summoned now from her work every hour to give directions and advice, which, the minute they were given, were repudiated with curses.

'I declare,' said aunt Katy, the housekeeper, 'if Master Tom isn't enough to use a body off of der feet. It's just four times I have got gruel ready for him this last two hours—doing all I could to suit him, and he swears at it, and flings it round real undecent. Why, he has got fever, and does he 'spect that to make things taste good to him when he has got fever? Why course I can't, and no need of him calling me a devil and all that—that ar very unnecessary, I think. I don't believe in no such. The Gordons always used to have some sense to 'em even if they was cross—but he ain't got a grain. I should think he was possessed with old Sam for my part. Bringing 'sgrace on us all the way he cuts up. We really don't know how to hold up our head, none on us. The Gordons have always been such a genteel family. Laws, we didn't know what privileges we had when we had Miss Nina. Them arr new girls dressed up with all their flounces and furbelbes!—Guess they has to take it.'

In time, however, even in spite of his chafing and fretfulness, and contempt of physicians' prescriptions, Tom seemed to recover by the same kind of fatality which makes ill weeds thrive apace. Meanwhile he employed his leisure hours in laying plans of revenge, to be executed as soon as he should be able to take to his horse again. Among other things he vowed deep vengeance on Abijah Skinflint, who he said he knew must have sold the powder and ammunition to the negroes in the Swamp. This may have been true or may not; but in cases of Lynch law such questions are indifferent matters. A man is accused, condemned, and judged at the will of his more powerful neighbour. It was sufficient for Tom that he thought so; and being sick and cross he thought so just now with more particular intensity.

Jim Stokes, he knew, cherished an animosity of long standing towards Abijah, which he could make use of in enlisting him in the cause. One of the first uses, therefore, which Tom made of his recovered liberty, after he was able to ride out, was to head a raid on Abijah's shop. The shop was without ceremony dismantled and plundered; and the mob having helped themselves to his whiskey, next amused themselves by tarring and feathering him. And having insulted and abused him to their satisfaction, and exacted a promise from him to leave the state within three days, they returned home glorious in their own eyes, and the next week a brilliant account of the affair appeared in the "Trumpet of Liberty," headed

'Summary Justice.'

Nobody pitied Abijah of course, and as he would probably have been quite willing to join in the same sort of treatment for any one else, we know not that we are particularly concerned for his doom. The respectable people in the neighbourhood first remarked that they didn't approve of mobs in general, and then dilated with visible satisfaction on this in particular. The foolish mob gloried and exulted, not considering that any day the same weapons might be turned against them.

The mob being now somewhat drilled and animated, Tom proposed that while their spirit was up to get up a hunting in the Swamp, which should more fully satisfy his own private vengeance. There is a sleeping tiger in the human breast that delights in violence and blood, and this tiger Tom resolved to unchain.

The act of outlawry had already publicly set up Harry as a mark for whatever cruelty drunken ingenuity might choose to perpetrate. As our readers may have a curiosity in this kind of literature, we will indulge them with a copy of this.

'State of North Carolina, Chowa County.'

'Whereas complaint upon oath hath this day been made to us, two of the justices of the peace for the said county and state aforesaid, by Thomas Gordon, that a certain male slave belonging to him, named Harry, a carpenter by trade, about thirty-five years old, five feet four inches high or thereabouts, dark complexion, stout built, blue eyes deep sunk in his head, forehead very square, tolerably loud voice, hath absented himself from his master's service, and is supposed to be lurking about in the Swamp, committing acts of felony or other misdeeds: these are therefore, in the name of the state aforesaid, to command said slave forthwith to surrender himself and return home to his said master; and we do hereby, by virtue of the Act of Assembly in such case made and provided, intimate and declare, that if the said slave Harry doth not surrender himself and return home immediately after the publication of these presents, that any person or persons may kill and destroy the said slave by such means as he or they may think fit, without accusation or impeachment of any crime or offence for so doing, and without incurring any penalty or forfeiture thereby.

‘ Given under our hands and seals,

‘ JAMES T. MULLER. (Seal.)

‘ T. BUTTERCOURT. (Seal.)’ *

One can scarcely contemplate without pity the condition of a population which grows up under the influence of such laws and customs as these. That the lowest brutality, and the most fiendish cruelty, should be remorselessly practised by those whose ferocity thus receives the sanction of the law cannot be wondered at. Tom Gordon convened at his house an assemblage of those whom he used as the tools and ministers of his vengeance. Harry had been secretly hated by them all in his prosperous days, because, though a slave, he was better dressed, better educated, and on the whole treated with more consideration by the Gordon family and their guests than they were; and at times he had had occasion to rebuke some of them for receiving from the slaves goods taken from the plantation. To be sure, while he was prosperous, they were outwardly subservient to him, as the great man of a great family; but now he was down, as the amiable fashion of the world generally is, they resolved to make up for their former subservience by redoubled insolence.

Jim Stokes, in particular, bore Harry a grudge for having once expressed himself with indignation concerning the meanness and brutality of his calling, and he was therefore the more willing to be made use of on the present occasion. Accordingly, on the morning we speak of, there was gathered before the door of the mansion at Canema, a confused mélange of men, of that general style of appearance which, in our times, we call ‘border ruffians’—half-drunken, profane, obscene as the harpies which descended on the feast of Æneas. Tom Gordon had only this advantage among them, that superior education and position had given him the power, when he chose, of assuming the appearance and of using the language of a gentleman. But he had enough of grossness within, to enable him, at will, to become as one of them. Tom’s arm was still worn in a sling; but as lack of energy never was one of his faults, he was about to take the saddle with his troop. At present, they were drawn up before the door, laughing, swearing, and drinking whiskey, which flowed in abundance.

* The original document from which this is taken can be seen in the Appendix. It appeared in the Wilmington Journal, December 18, 1830.

The dogs, the better-mannered brutes of the two by all odds, were struggling in their leashes with impatience and excitement. Tom Gordon stood forth on the veranda, after the fashion of great generals of old, who harangued their troops on the eve of battle. Any one who has read speeches of the leaders who presided over the sacking of Lawrence, will get an idea of some features in this style of eloquence, which our pen cannot represent.

'Now, boys,' said Tom, 'you are getting your names up. You've done some good work already; you've given that old snivelling priest a taste of true orthodox doctrine that will enlighten him for the future! You've given that long-nosed Skinflint light enough to see the error of his ways!'

A general laugh here arose, and voices repeated,

'Ah! ah! that we did! Didn't we, though?'

'I reckon you did,' said Tom Gordon. 'I reckon he didn't need candles to see his sins by, that night!'

'Didn't we make a candle of his old dog-kennel? Didn't he have light to see his way out of the state by, and didn't we give him a suit to keep him warm on the road? Ah, boys, that was a warm suit—no mistake. It was a suit that will stick to him too. He won't trade that off for rum in a hurry, I'm thinking. Will he, boys?'

Bursts of crazy, half-drunken applause here interrupted the orator.

'Pity we hadn't put a match to it!' shouted one.

'Ah, well; boys, you did enough for that time. Wait till you catch these sneaking varmin in the Swamp; you shall do what you like with them. Nobody shall hinder you, that's law and order. These foxes have troubled us long enough, stealing at our hen-roosts while we were asleep. We shall make it hot for them if we catch them; and we are going to catch them! There are no two ways about it. This old swamp is like Davy's coon—it's got to come down, and it will come down, boys, when it sees us coming—no mistake about that. Now, boys, mind catch him alive if you can, but shoot him if you can't. Remember, I'll give a hundred and fifty dollars for his head.'

A loud shout chorused this last announcement, and Tom descended in glory to take his place in his saddle.

Once we suppose this history would not have been believed had it been told; but of late our own sons and brothers have been hounded and hunted by just such men with such means.

The fire which began in the dry tree, has spread to the green.
 Long live the great Christianising Institution!!!

CHAPTER LII.

CLAYTON'S RECOVERY.

CLAYTON, at the time of the violent assault which we have described, received an injury upon the head which rendered him insensible. When he came to himself he was conscious at first only of a fanning of summer breezes. He opened his eyes and looked listlessly up into blue sky that appeared through thousand leafy hollows of waving boughs. Voices of birds warbling and calling like answering echoes to each other fell dreamily on his ear. Some gentle hand was placing bandages about his head, and figures of women he did not recognize moved whisperingly around him, tending and watching.

He dropped asleep again, and thus for many hours lay in a kind of heavy trance.

Harry and Lisette had vacated for his use their hut; but as it was now the splendid weather of October, when earth and sky become a temple of beauty and serenity, they tended him during the hours of the day in the open air, and it would seem as if there were no art of healing like to this. As air and heat and water all have a benevolent tendency to enter and fill up a vacuum, so we might fancy the failing vitality of the human system to receive accessions of vigour by being placed in the vicinity of the healthful growth of nature. All the trees which John saw around the river of life and heaven bore healing leaves; and there may be a sense in which the trees of our world bear leaves that are healing both to body and soul. He who hath gone out of the city sick, disgusted, and wearied, and laid himself down in the forest under the fatherly shadow of an oak, may have heard this whispered to him in the leafy rustlings of a thousand tongues.

'See,' says Dred to Harry, as they were watching over the yet insensible form of Clayton, 'how the word of the Lord is fulfilled on this people: "He shall deliver them every man into the hand of his neighbour, and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey."

'Yes,' said Harry, 'but this is a good man; he stands up for our rights. If he had his way we should soon have justice done us.'

'Yes,' said Dred; 'but it is even as it was of old; "Behold

I send unto you prophets and wise men, and some of them shall ye slay; for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears have they closed. Therefore the Lord shall bring upon this generation the blood of all the slain, from the blood of righteous Abel to the blood of Zacharias the son of Barachias, whom they slew between the temple and the altar."

After a day or two spent in a kind of listless dreaming, Clayton was so far recovered as to be able to sit up, and look about him. The serene tranquillity of a lovely October sky seemed to fall like a spell upon his soul.

Amidst the wild and desolate swamp, here was an island of security, where Nature took men to her sheltering bosom. A thousand birds speaking with a thousand airy voices, were calling from breezy tree-tops, and from swinging cradles of vine-leaves. White clouds sailed in changing and varying islands over the heavy green battlements of the woods. The wavering slumberous sound of thousand leaves, through which the autumn air walked to and fro, consoled him. Life began to look to him like a troubled dream, for ever past. His own sufferings—the hour of agony and death, which he had never dared to remember—seemed now to wear a new and glorified form. Such is the divine power in which God still reveals himself, through the lovely and incorruptible forms of nature.

Clayton became interested in Dred, as a psychological study. At first, he was silent and reserved, but attended to the wants of his guest with evident respect and kindness. Gradually, however, the love of expression, which lies hidden in almost every soul, began to unfold itself in him, and he seemed to find pleasure in a sympathetic listener. His wild jargon of Hebraistic phrases, names, and allusions, had for Clayton, in his enfeebled state, a quaint and poetic interest. He compared him, in his own mind, to one of those old rude Gothic doorways, so frequent in European cathedrals, where scriptural images, carved in rough granite, mingle themselves with a thousand wayward fantastic freaks of architecture, and sometimes he thought, with a sigh, how much might have been accomplished by a soul so ardent, and a frame so energetic, had they been enlightened and guided.

Dred would sometimes come, in the shady part of the afternoon, and lie on the grass beside him, and talk for hours in a quaint, rambling, dreamy style, through which there were occasional flashes of practical ability and shrewdness.

He had been a great traveller—and a traveller through regions generally held inaccessible to human foot and eye. He had explored not only the vast swamp-girdle of the Atlantic, but the ever glades of Florida, with all their strange and tropical luxuriance of growth. He had wandered along the dreary and perilous belt of sand which skirts the southern Atlantic shores, full of quicksands and of dangers. And there he had mused of the eternal secret of the tides, with whose restless never-ceasing rise and fall, the soul of man has a mysterious sympathy. Destitute of the light of philosophy and science, he had revolved in the twilight of his ardent and struggling thoughts the causes of natural phenomena, and settled these questions for himself by theories of his own. Sometimes his residence for weeks had been a stranded hulk, cast on one of these inhospitable shores, where he fasted and prayed, and fancied that answering voices came to him in the moaning of the wind, and the sullen swell of the sea.

Our readers behold him now stretched on the grass beside the hut of Harry and Lisette, in one of his calmest and most communicative moods. The children, with Lisette and the women, were searching for grapes in a distant part of the enclosure, and Harry, with the other fugitive man, had gone to bring in certain provisions which were to have been deposited for them in a distant part of the Swamp by some of their confederates on one of the plantations. Old Tiff was hoeing potatoes diligently in a spot not very far distant, and evidently listening to the conversation with an ear of shrewd attention.

'Yes,' said Dred, with that misty light in his eye which one may often have remarked in the eyes of enthusiasts, 'the glory holds off, but it is coming. Now is the groaning time—that was revealed to me when I was down at Okerecoke, when I slept three weeks in the hull of a ship, out of which all souls had perished.'

'Rather a dismal abode, my friend,' said Clayton, by way of drawing him on to conversation.

'The Spirit drove me there,' said Dred, 'for I had besought the Lord to show unto me the knowledge of things to come; and the Lord bade me to go from the habitations of men, and to seek out the desolate place of the sea, and dwell in the wreck of a ship that was forsaken, for a sign of desolation unto this people. So I went and dwelt there, and the Lord called me Amraphal, because hidden things of judgment were made known unto me. And the Lord showed unto me, that even as a ship which is forsaken of the waters, wherein all flesh have died, so shall it be with the nation of the oppressor.'

'How did the Lord show you this?' said Clayton, bent upon pursuing his inquiry.

'Mine ear received it in the night season,' said Dred; 'and I heard how the whole creation groaneth and travaileth, waiting for the adoption; and because of this he hath appointed the tide.'

'I don't see the connection,' said Clayton. 'Why because of this?'

'Because,' said Dred, 'every day is full of labor, but the labor goeth back again into the seas; so that travail of all generations hath gone back, till the Desire of all nations shall come—and he shall come with burning, and with judgment, and with great shakings; but in the end thereof shall be peace. Wherefore it is written, that in the new heavens and the new earth there shall be no more sea.'

These words were uttered with an air of solemn assured confidence, that impressed Clayton strangely. Something in his inner nature seemed to recognise in them a shadow of things hoped for. He was in that mood into which the mind of him who strives with the evils of this world must often fall—a mood of weariness and longing. The cry of the human soul tempest-tossed, and not comforted for rest and assurance for the state where there shall be no more sea.

'So then,' he said unto Dred—'so then, you believe that these heavens and earth shall be made new?'

'Assuredly,' said Dred. 'And the King shall reign in righteousness. He shall deliver the needy when he crieth—the poor and him that hath no helper. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence. He shall sit upon a white cloud, and the rainbow shall be round about his head; and the elect of the Lord shall be kings and priests on the earth.'

'And do you think you shall be one of them?' said Clayton.

Dred gave a kind of inward groan.

'Not every one that prophesieth in His name shall be found worthy,' he said. 'I have prayed the Lord, but He has not granted me the assurance. I am the rod of his wrath to execute vengeance on His enemies. Shall the axe magnify itself against Him that lifteth it?'

The conversation was here interrupted by Harry, who, suddenly springing from the tree, came up in a hurried and agitated manner.

'The devil is broken loose,' he said. 'Tom Gordon is out with his whole crew at his heels, beating the Swamp. A more drunken, swearing, ferocious set I never saw. They have got on to the trail of poor Jim, and are tracking him without mercy.'

A dark light flashed from Dred's eye, as he sprang upon his feet.

'The voice of the Lord shaketh the wilderness; yea, the wilderness of Kadish; I will go forth and deliver him.'

He seized his rifle and shot-bag, and in a few moments was gone.

It was Harry's intention to have followed him; but Lisette threw herself weeping on his neck.

'Don't go! don't!' she said. 'What shall we all do without you? Stay with us? You'll certainly be killed, and you can do no good.'

'Consider,' said Clayton, 'that you have not the familiarity with these swamps, nor the wonderful physical power of this man. It would only be throwing away your life.'

The hours of that day passed gloomily. Sometimes the brutal sound of the hunt seemed to sweep near them—the crack of rifles, the baying of dogs, the sound of oaths—and then again all went off into silence, and nothing was heard but the innocent patter of the leaf upon leaf, and the warbling of the birds—singing cheerily, ignorant of the abyss of cruelty and crime over which they sang.

Towards sunset a rustling was heard in the branches of the oak, and Dred dropped down into the enclosure wet, and soiled, and wearied. All gathered round him in a moment.

'Where is Jim?' said Harry.

'Slain!' said Dred. 'The archers pressed him sore, and he hath fallen in the wilderness.'

There was a general exclamation of horror.

Dred made a movement to sit down on the earth. He lost his balance and fell; and they all saw now, what at first they had not noticed, a wound in his breast from which the blood was welling. His wife fell by his side with wild moans of sorrow. He lifted his hand and motioned her from him.

'Peace!' he said, 'peace! It is enough. Behold, I go unto the witnesses who cry day and night.'

The circle stood around him in mute horror and surprise, Clayton was the first who had presence of mind to kneel and staunch the blood. Dred looked at him—his calm large eyes filled with supernatural light.

'All over!' he said.

He put his hand calmly to his side, and felt the gushing blood. He took some in his hand and threw it upward, crying out with wild energy, in the words of an ancient prophet—

‘Oh, earth—earth—earth! Cover thou not my blood—’

Behind the dark barrier of the woods the sun was setting gloriously. Piles of loose floating clouds, which all day long had been moving through the sky in white and silvery stillness, now one after another took up the rosy flush, and became each one a light-bearer filled with ethereal radiance. And the birds sang on as they ever sing, unterrified by the great wail of human sorrow. It was evident to the little circle that he who was mightier than the kings of the earth was there. And that that splendid frame, which had so long rejoiced in the exuberance of health and strength, was now to be resolved again into the eternal elements.

‘Harry,’ he said, ‘lay me beneath the heap of witness.—Let the God of their fathers judge between us.’

CHAPTER LIII.

THE NIGHT FUNERAL.

THE death of Dred fell like a night of despair on the hearts of the little fugitive circle in the swamps—on the hearts of multitudes in the surrounding plantations who had regarded him as a prophet and a deliverer.

He in whom they trusted was dead! The splendid athletic form so full of wild vitality, the powerful arm, the trained and keen-seeing eye, all struck down at once! The grand and solemn voice hushed, and all the splendid poetry of olden time, the inspiring symbols and prophetic dreams which had so wrought upon his own soul, and with which he had wrought upon the souls of others, seemed to pass away with him, and to recede into the distance, and become unsubstantial, like the remembered sounds of mighty winds, or solemn visions of evening clouds, in times long departed. On that night, when the woods had ceased to reverberate the brutal sounds of baying dogs, and the more brutal profanity of drunken men, when the leaves stood still on the trees, and the forest lay piled up in the darkness like black clouds, and the morning star was standing like a calm angelic presence above them, there might have been heard in the little clearing a muffled sound of footsteps, treading heavily, and voices of those that wept with a repressed and quiet weeping, as they bore the dark chieftain to his grave beneath the blasted tree.

Of the undaunted circle who had met there at the same hour many evenings before some had dared to be present to-night; for, hearing the report of the hunt, they had left their huts on the plantations by stealth when all were asleep, and eluding the vigilance of the patrols who guard the plantations, had come to the forest to learn the fate of their friends; and bitter was the dismay and anguish which filled their souls when they learned the result.

It is melancholy to reflect that among the children of one Father, an event which excites in one class bitterness and lamentation should, in the other, be the cause of exultation and triumph. But the world has been thousands of years, and not yet learned the first two words of the Lord's Prayer, and when all tribes and nations have learned these, then His kingdom will come and His will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

Among those who stood around the grave none seemed more bowed down and despairing than one whom we have before introduced to the reader under the name of Hannibal. He was a tall and splendidly-formed negro, whose large head, high forehead, and marked features indicated resolution and intellectual ability. He had been all his life held as the property of an uneducated man of very mean and parsimonious character, who was singularly divided in his treatment of him by a desire to make the most of his energies and capabilities as a slave, and a fear lest they should develop so fast as to render him unfit for the condition of slavery.

Hannibal had taught himself to read and write; but the secret of the acquisition was guarded in his own bosom as vigilantly as the traveller among thieves would conceal in his breast an inestimable diamond, for he well knew that were these acquisitions discovered, his master's fears would be so excited, as to lead him to realise at once a present sum upon him by selling him to the more hopeless prison-house of the far South, separating him once more from wife and family. Hannibal was generally employed as the keeper of a ferry-boat by his master, and during the hours when he was waiting for passengers, found many opportunities for gratifying, in an imperfect manner, his thirst for knowledge.

Those who have always had books about them more than they could or would read, know nothing of the passionate eagerness with which a repressed and starved intellect devours in secret its stolen food. In a little chink between the logs of his ferry-house there was secreted a Bible, a copy of Robinson Crusoe, and an odd number of a Northern newspaper, which had been dropped from the pocket of a passenger, and when the door was shut and barred at night, and his bit of pine-knot lighted, he would take these out and read them hour by hour. Then he yearned after the wild freedom of the desolate island, he placed his wife and children in imagination in the little barricaded abode of Robinson. He hunted and made coats of skin and gathered strange fruits from trees with unknown names, and felt himself a free man. Over a soul so strong and so repressed, it is not to be wondered at that Dred should have acquired a peculiar power. The study of the Bible had awakened in his mind that vague tumult of aspirations and hopes which it ever excites in the human breast, and he was prompt to believe that the Lord who visited Israel in Egypt had listened to the sighings of his captivity, and sent a prophet and deliverer to his people. Like a torch carried in a stormy night, this hope had blazed up within him; but the cold blast of death had whistled by, and it was extinguished for ever.

Among the small band that stood around the dead on the edge of the grave, he stood, looking fixedly on the face of the departed.

In the quaint and shaggy mound to which Dred had attached that rugged Oriental appellation, Jegar—sahadutha, or the 'Heap of Witness'—there was wildly flaring a huge pine-knot torch, whose light fell with a distinct glare on the prostrate form. He lay there like a kingly pine, uprooted—no more to wave its branches in air, yet mighty in its fall, with all the shaggy majesty of its branches around.

Whatever might have been the strife and struggle of the soul once imprisoned in that form, there was stamped upon the sombre face an expression of majestic and mournful tranquillity, as if that long suffering and gracious God, to whose judgment he had made his last appeal, had rendered that judgment in mercy. When the statesmen and mighty men of our race die, though they had the weaknesses and sins of humanity, they want not orators in the Church to draw the veil gently, to speak softly of their errors and loudly of their good, and to predict for them, if not an abundant entrance, yet at least a safe asylum among the blessed; and something not to be rebuked in our common nature inclines us to join in a hopeful amen. It is not easy for us to believe that a great and powerful soul can be lost to God and itself for ever.

But he who lies here so still and mournfully, in this flickering torch-light, had struggling within him the energies which make the patriot and the prophet: crushed beneath a mountain of ignorance, they rose blind and distorted; yet, had knowledge enlightened and success crowned them, his name might have been, with that of Toussaint, celebrated in mournful sonnet by the deepest-thinking poet of the age:—

Powers that will work for thee—air, earth, and skies;
There’s not a breathing of the common wind
That will forget thee: thou hast great allies;
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man’s unconquerable mind.’

The weight of so great an affliction seemed to have repressed the usual vivacity with which the negro is wont to indulge the expression of grief. When the body was laid down by the side of the grave, there was for a time a silence so deep that the rustling of the leaves, and the wild, doleful clamour of the frogs and turtles in the swamps, and the surges of the winds in the pine-tree tops, were all that met the ear. Even the wife of the dead stood with her shawl wrapt tightly about her, rocking to and fro, as if in the extremity of grief.

An old man in the company, who had officiated sometimes as preacher among the negroes, began to sing a well-known hymn very commonly used at negro funerals, possibly because its wild and gloomy imagery has something exciting to their quick imaginations. The words rose on the night air—

‘Hark from the tombs a doleful sound,
My ears attend the cry;
Ye living men, come view the ground
Where ye must shortly lie.’

During the singing of this verse Hannibal stood silent, with his arms gloomily folded, his eyes fixed on the lifeless face. Gradually the sentiment seemed to inspire his soul with a kind of severe triumph: he lifted his head, and joined his bass tone in the singing of the second verse:—

‘Princes, this clay must be your bed,
In spite of all your towers;
The tall, the wise, the reverend head,
Must lie a[ll]ow as ours.’

‘Yes,’ he said, ‘brethren, that will be the way of it; they triumph and lord it over us now, but their pomp will be brought down to the grave, and the noise of their viols—the worm shall be spread under them, and the worm shall cover them—and when we come to stand together at the judgment-seat, our testimony will be took THERE, if it never was afore, and the Lord will judge between us and our oppressors—that's one comfort. Now, brethren, let's jest lay him in the grave, and be that's a better man, or would have done better in his place, let him judge him if he dares.'

They lifted him up and laid him in the grave, and in a few moments all the mortal signs by which that soul had been recognised on earth had vanished, to appear no more till the great day of judgment and decision.

CHAPTER LIV.

RESULTS.

CLAYTON had not been an unsympathising or inattentive witness of these scenes. It is true that he knew not the whole depth of the affair; but Harry's letter and his own observations had led him, without explanation, to feel that there was a perilous degree of excitement in some of the actors in the scene before him, which, unless some escape-valve were opened, might lead to most fatal results.

The day after the funeral he talked with Harry, wisely and kindly assuming himself nothing on the ground either of race or position, showing to him the undesirableness and hopelessness, under present circumstances, of any attempt by force to right the wrongs under which his class were suffering, and opening to him and his associates a prospect of a safer way by flight.

One can scarcely appreciate the moral resolution and force of character which could induce a person in Clayton's position in society, himself sustaining in the eye of the law the legal relation of a slaveholder, to give advice of this kind. No crime is visited with more unsparing rigour by the régime of Southern society than the aiding or abetting the escape of a slave. He who does it is tried as a negro-stealer; and in some states death, in others a long and disgraceful imprisonment in the Penitentiary, is the reward.

For granting the slightest assistance and succour in cases like these, for harbouring the fugitive for even a night, for giving him the meanest shelter and food, persons have been stripped of their whole property, and turned out destitute upon the world. Others, for no other crime, have languished for years in unhealthy dungeons, and come out with broken health and wasted energies: nor has the most saintly patience and purity of character in the victim been able to lessen or mitigate the penalty. It was, therefore, only by the discerning power of a mind sufficiently clear and strong to see its way through the mists of educational association that Clayton could feel himself to be doing right in thus violating the laws and customs of the social state under which he was born. But in addition to his belief in the inalienable right of every man to liberty, he had at this time a firm conviction that nothing, but the removal of some of these minds from the oppressions which were goading them could prevent a development of bloody-insurrection.

It is probable that nothing has awakened more bitterly the animosity of a slave-holding community than the existence in the northern states of an indefinite yet very energetic institution, known as the underground railroad; and yet would they but reflect wisely on the things that belong to their peace, they would know that this has removed many a danger from their dwellings. One has only to become well acquainted with some of those fearless and energetic men, who have found their way to freedom by its means, to feel certain that such minds and hearts would have proved in time an incendiary magazine under the scorching reign of slavery. But by means of this, men of that class, who cannot be kept in slavery, have found a road to liberty which endangered the shedding of no blood but their own; and the record of the strange and perilous means by which these escapes have been accomplished sufficiently shows the resolute nature of the men by whom they were undertaken.

It was soon agreed that a large party of fugitives should in concert effect their escape.

Harry, being so white as easily to escape detection out of the immediate vicinity where he was known, assumed the task of making arrangements, for which he was amply supplied with money by Clayton.

It is well known that there are, during greater part of the year, in the swamps, lumberers engaged in the cutting and making of shingles, who have extensive camps, and live there for months at a time. These camps are made by laying foundations of logs on the spongy soil, thus forming platforms on which rude cabins are erected. In the same manner roads are constructed into distant parts of the swamp, by means of which transportation is carried on; there is also a canal through the middle of the swamp, in which small sailing-craft pass backwards and forwards with shingles and produce. In the employ of these lumberers are multitudes of slaves, hired from surrounding proprietors. They live here in a situation of comparative freedom, being only obliged to make a certain number of staves and shingles within a stipulated time, and being furnished with very comfortable provisions: living thus somewhat in the condition of freemen, they are said to be more intelligent, energetic, and self-respecting than the generality of slaves. The camp of the fugitives had not been without intercourse with a camp of lumberers, some five miles distant. In cases of straits they had received secret supplies from them; and one or two of the more daring and intelligent of the slave-lumberers had attended some of Dred's midnight meetings. It was determined, therefore, to negotiate with one of the slaves, who commanded a lighter or small vessel in which lumber was conveyed to Norfolk, to assist their escape.

On some consultation, however, it was found that the numbers wanting to escape were so large as not to be able, without creating suspicion, to travel together, and it was therefore decided to make detachments. Milly had determined to cast in her lot with the fugitives, out of regard to her grandchild, poor little Tomtit, whose utter thoughtlessness formed a touching contrast to the gravity and earnestness of her affections and desires for him. He was to her the only remaining memorial of a large family, which had been torn from her by the ordinary reverses and chances of slavery, and she clung to him therefore with the undivided energy of her great heart. As far as her own rights were concerned, she would have made a willing surrender of them, remaining patiently in the condition wherein she was called, and bearing injustice and oppression as a means of spiritual improvement, seeking to do what good lay in her power. Every individual has an undoubted right, if they choose, thus to resign the rights and privileges of their earthly birthright, but the question is a very different one when it involves the improvement and the immortal interests of those for whom the ties of blood oblige them to have care.

Milly, who viewed everything with the eye of a Christian, was far less impressed by the rigour and severity of Tom Gordon's administration than by the dreadful demoralization of character which he brought upon the plantation.

Tomtit, being a bright, handsome child, his master had taken a particular fancy to him. He would have him always about his person, and treated him with the same mixture of indulgence and caprice which one would bestow upon a spaniel. He took particular pleasure in teaching him to drink and to swear, apparently for nothing else than the idle amusement it afforded him to witness the exhibition in so young a child. In vain Milly, who had dared use more freedom with him than any other servant, expostulated. He laughed or swore at her according to the state in which he happened to be. Milly therefore determined to join at once the flying party, and take her darling with her. Perhaps, she would not have been able to accomplish this had it not been for what she considered a rather fortunate reverse, which about this time brought Tomtit into disgrace with his master. Owing to some piece of careless mischief which he had committed, the child had been beaten with a severity as thoughtless and cruel as the indulgence he at other times received; and while bruised and trembling from this infliction, he was fully ready to fly anywhere.

Quite unexpectedly to all parties it was discovered that Tom Gordon's confidential servant and valet, Jim, was one of the most forward to escape. This man, from that peculiar mixture of boldness, adroitness, cunning, and drollery, which often exists among negroes, had stood for years as prime and undisputed favourite with his master. He had never wanted for money or anything that money could purchase, and he had had an almost unproved liberty of saying in an odd fashion what he pleased with the licensed audacity of a court-buffoon.

One of the slaves expressed astonishment, that he, in his favoured position, should think of such a thing. Jim gave a knowing inclination of his head to one side, and said,

'Fac' is, brethren, dis chile's just tired of dese yer partnership concerns. I and massa we has all things in common, sure'nough, but den I'd rather have less of 'em, and have something dat's mine. 'Sides which I never's going to have a wife 'till I can get one that 'longs to me, and nobody else. That ar's a thing I'se 'ticlar about.'

The conspirators were wont to hold their meetings nightly, in the woods near the swamp, for purposes of concert and arrangement. Jim had been trusted so much to come and go at his own pleasure, that he felt little fear of detection, always having some plausible excuse on hand if inquiries were made. It is to be confessed that he had been a very profane and irreverent fellow, often attending prayer-meetings and other religious exercises of the negroes, for no other apparent purpose than to be able to give burlesque imitations of all the proceedings, for the amusement of his master and his master's vile associates. Whenever, therefore, he was missed, he would, upon inquiry, assert, with a knowing wink, that 'he had been out to de prayer metin.'

'Seems to me, Jim,' says Tom, one morning, when he felt particularly ill-natured, 'seems to me you are doing nothing but going to meeting lately. I don't like it. I'm not going to have it. Some devilry or other you are up to, and I'm going to put a stop to it. Now, mind yourself, don't you go any more. I'll give you'—We shall not mention particularly what Tom was in the habit of threatening to give in cases of disobedience. Here was a dilemma. One attendance more in the woods this very night was necessary, was indeed indispensable. Jim put all his powers of pleasing into requisition. Never had he made such desperate efforts to be entertaining. He sang, he danced, he mimicked sermons, carried on mock meetings, and seemed to whisk all things sacred and profane in one great syllabub of uproarious merriment; and this to an idle man with a whole day upon his hands, and an urgent necessity for never having time to think, was no small affair. Tom mentally reflected towards evening, as he lay stretched out in the veranda smoking his cigar, what in the world he should do without Jim to keep him in spirits, and Jim, under cover of the day's glory, had ventured to request of his master the liberty of an hour, which he employed in going to his tryst in the woods. This was a bold step, considering how positively he had been forbidden to do it in the morning; but Jim heartily prayed to his own wits, the only god he had been taught to worship, to help him out once more. He was returning home, hastening in order to be in season for his master's bed-time, hoping to escape unquestioned as to where he had been. The appointments had all been made, and between two and three o'clock that night, the whole party were to strike out upon their course, and ere morning to have travelled the first stage of their pilgrimage towards freedom.

Already the sense of a new nature was beginning to dawn on Jim's mind,—a sense of something graver, steadier, and more manly than the wild frolicsome life he had been leading: his bosom throbbed with a strange new unknown hope.

Suddenly on the very boundary of the spot where the wood joins the plantation, who should he meet but Tom Gordon, sent there as if he had been warned by his evil stars.

'Now, Lord help me, if dere is any Lord,' said Jim: 'well, I'se got to blaze it out now de bes way I ken.'

He walked directly up to his master with his usual air of assurance.

'Why, Jim,' said Tom, 'where have you been? I've been looking for you?'

'Why bless you, masser honey, I'se been out to de metin.'

'Didn't I tell you, you dog,' said Tom, with an oath, 'that you were not to go to any more of those meetings?'

'Why, laws, masser honey, for my heavenly Massa I done forgot every word you said,' said Jim. 'I'se been so kind of tumbled up and down, and things has been so curus.'

The ludicrous grimace, the tone and attitude of affected contrition, with which all this was said, rather amused Tom, and though he still maintained an air of sternness, the subtle negro saw at once his advantage, and added "'Clar, if I isn't most dead! old Pomp he preached, and he gets me so full of grace I'se fit to bust! I has to go do something wicked, else I'll get translated one dese yer day's like 'Lijah, and den who'd massa have to wait on him?'

'I don't believe you've been to meeting,' said Tom, eyeing him with affected suspicion. 'You've been out on some spree.'

'Why, laws, masser honey, you hurts my feelins, now! I'sc in hopes you'd say you see de grace a shinin' out all over me! Why, I'se been in a clar state of glorification all dis yer evening. Dat ar old Pomp! Dar's no mistake, he does lift a body up powerful!'

'You don't remember a word he said, now, I'll bet,' said Tom. 'Where was the text?'

'Text?' said Jim, with assurance. "'Twas in the twenty-fourth chapter of Jerusalem, sixteenth verse.'

'Well,' said Tom, 'what was it? I should like to know.'

'Laws, masser, I b'lieve I can 'peat it,' said Jim, with an indescribable air of waggish satisfaction. "'Twas dis yer: "Ye shall sarch for me in de mornin', and ye won't find me." Dat ar's a mighty solemn text, masser, and ye ought to be 'flecting on't.'

And Tom had occasion to reflect on it the next morning; when, having stormed, and sworn, and pulled until he broke the bell-wire, no Jim appeared. It was some time before he could actually realize or believe he was gone. The ungrateful dog! the impudent puppy ! who had had, all his life, everything he wanted, to run away from him !

Tom aroused the whole country in pursuit. Servants were found missing in many other plantations. There was a general excitement through the community. The 'Trumpet of Liberty' began to blow dolorous notes ; and articles, headed 'The Results of Abolitionist Teaching,' and 'Covert Incendiarism,' began to appear. It was recommended that a general search should be made through the country for all persons tinctured with abolitionist sentiments, and immediate measures passed to oblige them to leave the state forthwith.

One or two respectable gentlemen, who were in the habit of taking the 'National Era,' were visited by members of a Vigilance Committee, and informed that they must immediately drop the paper, or leave the state ; and when one of them talked of his right as a free citizen, and asked how they would enforce their requisitions, supposing he determined to stand for his liberty, the party informed him succinctly to the following purport :—'If you do not comply, your corn, grain, and fodder will be burned ; your cattle driven off ; and if you still persist, your house will be set on fire and consumed, and you will never know who does it.'

When the good gentleman inquired if this was freedom, they informed him, that freedom consisted in their right and power to make their neighbours submit to their will ; and he would find himself in a free country, so far as this—that every one would feel free to annoy and maltreat him, so long as he opposed the popular will.

This modern doctrine of liberty has of late been strikingly and edifyingly enforced on the minds of some of our brethren and sisters in the new states, to whom the offer of relinquishing their principles or their property and lives has been tendered with the same admirable explicitness.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that both these worthy gentlemen, to use the language of their conquerors, 'caved in,' and thus escaped with no other disadvantage than a general plundering of their smoke-houses, the hams in which were thought a desirable addition to a triumphant entertainment proposed to be given in honour of law and order, by THE ASSOCIATE BANDS OF THE GLORIOUS IMMORTAL COONS, the body-guard which was Tom Gordon's instrument in all these exploits. In fact, this association, although wanting the advantage of an ordaining prayer and a distribution of Bibles, as has been the case with some more recently sent from southern states to beat the missionary drum of state rights, and the principles of law and order on our frontiers, yet conducted themselves in a manner which might have won the approbation even in Colonel Buford's regiment, giving such exhibitions of liberty as were sufficient to justify all despots in putting it down by force for centuries to come.

Tom Gordon was the great organizer and leader of all these operations. His suspicions had connected Clayton with the disappearance of his slaves, and he followed upon his track with the sagacity of a bloodhound.

The outrage which he had perpetrated upon him in the forest, so far from being a matter of shame or concealment, was paraded as a cause for open boast and triumph. Tom rode about with his arm in a sling, as a wounded hero, and received touching testimonials and demonstrations from sundry ladies of his acquaintance, for his gallantry and spirit. When, on the present occasion, he found the pursuit of his slaves hopeless, his wrath and malice knew no bounds, and he determined to stir up and enkindle against Clayton to the utmost degree, the animosities of the planters around his estate at Magnolia Grove in South Carolina.

This it was not difficult to do; we have already shown how much latent discontent and heart-burning had been excited by the course which Clayton and his sister had pursued on their estate. Tom Gordon had a college acquaintance with the eldest son of one of the neighbouring families, a young man of as reckless and dissipated habits as his own. Hearing, therefore, that Clayton had retired to Magnolia Grove, he accepted an invitation of this young man's, to make him a visit, principally, as it would appear, for the purpose of instigating some mischief with regard to him.

CHAPTER LV.

DESPOTIC LIBERTY.

THE reader next beholds Clayton at Magnolia Grove, whither he had fled to recruit his exhausted health and spirits. He had been accompanied there by Frank Russel.

* Colonel Buford's regiment, famous for murder and pillage in Kansas, was despatched from South Carolina with religious services by clergymen accompanied with a presentation of Bibles.

Our readers may often have observed how long habits of intimacy may survive between two persons who have embarked in moral courses which, if pursued, must eventually separate them for ever. For such is the force of moral elements, that the ambitious and self-seeking cannot always walk with those who love good for its own sake.

In this world, however, where all these things are imperfectly developed, habits of intimacy often subsist a long time between the most opposing affinities.

The fact was, that Russel would not give up the society of Clayton. He admired the very thing in him which he wanted himself. And he comforted himself for not listening to his admonitions by the tolerance and good-nature with which he had always heard them.

When he heard that he was ill he came to him, and insisted upon travelling with him with the utmost fidelity and kindness. Clayton had not seen Anne since his affliction—both because his time had been very much engaged, and because they who cannot speak of their sorrows often shrink from the society of those whose habits of intimacy and affection might lead them to desire such confidence.

But he was not destined in his new retreat to find the peace he desired.

Our readers may remember that there were intimations conveyed through his sister some time since of discontent arising in the neighbourhood.

The presence of Tom Gordon soon began to make itself felt. As a conductor introduced into an electric atmosphere will draw to itself the fluid, so he became an organising point for the prevailing dissatisfaction.

He went to dinner-parties and talked, he wrote in the nearest paper, he excited the inflammable and inconsiderate; and before he had been there many weeks a Vigilance Association was formed among the younger and more hot-headed of his associates to search out and extirpate covert abolitionism.

Anne and her brother first became sensible of an entire cessation of all those neighborly acts of kindness and hospitality in which southern American people, when in good humour, are so abundant.

At last, one day, Clayton was informed that three or four gentlemen of his acquaintance were waiting to see him in the parlor below. On descending, he was received first by his nearest neighbour, Judge Oliver, a fine-looking elderly gentleman, of influential family and connexion.

He was attended by Mr. Bradshaw, whom we have already introduced to our readers, and by a Mr. Knapp, a very wealthy planter, a man of great energy and ability, who had for some years figured as the representative of his native state in Congress.

It was evident, by the embarrassed air of the party, that they had come on business of no pleasing character.

It is not easy for persons, however much excited they may be, to enter upon offensive communications to persons who receive them with calm and gentlemanly civility; therefore, after being seated, and having discussed the ordinary topics of the weather and the crops, the party looked one upon another in a little uncertainty which should begin the real business of the interview.

‘Mr. Clayton,’ at length said Judge Oliver, ‘we are really sorry to be obliged to make disagreeable communications to you: we have all of us had the sincerest respect for your family and for yourself. I have known and honoured your father many years, Mr. Clayton; and, for my own part, I must say, I anticipated much pleasure from your residence in our neighborhood. I am really concerned to be obliged to say anything unpleasant, but I am under the necessity of telling you that the course you have been pursuing, with regard to your servants, being contrary to the law and usages of our social institutions, can no longer be permitted among us. You are aware that the teaching of slaves to read and write is forbidden by the law, under severe penalties. We have always been liberal in the interpretation of this law; exceptional violations, conducted with privacy and discretion, in the case of favoured servants, whose general good conduct seems to merit such confidence, have from time to time existed and passed among us without notice or opposition; but the instituting of a regular system of instruction, to the extent and degree which exists upon your plantation, is a thing so directly in the face of the law, that we can no longer tolerate it, and we have determined, unless this course is dropped, to take measures to put the law into execution.’

‘I had paid my adopted state the compliment,’ said Clayton, ‘to suppose such laws to be a mere relic of barbarous ages, which the practical Christianity of our times would treat as a dead letter. I began my arrangements in all good faith, not dreaming that there could be found those who would oppose a cause so evidently called for by the spirit of the Gospel and the spirit of the age.*

'You are entirely mistaken, sir,' said Mr. Knapp, in a tone of great decision, 'if you suppose these laws are or ever can be a matter of indifference to us, or can be suffered to become a dead letter. Sir, they are founded on the very nature of our institution; they are indispensable to the preservation of our property and the safety of our families: once educate the negro population, and the whole system of our domestic institution is at an end. Our negroes have acquired already, by living among us, a degree of sagacity and intelligence which makes it difficult to hold an even rein over them, and once open the flood-gates of education and there is no saying where they and we might be carried. I, for my part, do not approve of these exceptional instances Judge Oliver mentioned. Generally speaking, those negroes, whose intelligence and good conduct would make them the natural recipients of such favours, are precisely those who are not to be trusted with them; it ruins them. Why just look at the history of the insurrection that came nearly cutting off the whole city of Charlestown. What sort of men were those who got it up? They were just your thoughtful, well-conducted men—just the kind of men that people are teaching to read, because they think they are so good it can do no harm. Sir, my father was one of the magistrates on the trial of those men, and I have heard him say often there was not one man of bad character among them. They had all been remarkable for their good character. Why, there was that Denmark Vesey, who was the head of it—for twenty years he served his master and was the most faithful creature that ever breathed, and after he got his liberty every body respected him and liked him. Why, at first, my father said the magistrates could not be brought to arrest him, they were so sure that he could not have been engaged in such an affair. Now all the leaders in that affair could read and write, they kept their lists of names, and nobody knows or ever will know how many were down on them, for those fellows were deep as the grave, and you couldn't get a word out of them. Sir, they died and made no sign; but all this is a warning to us.'

'And do you think,' said Clayton, 'that if men of that degree of energy and intelligence are refused instruction, they will not find means to get knowledge for themselves? and if they do get it themselves in spite of your precautions, they will certainly use it against you. The fact is, gentlemen, it is inevitable that a certain degree of culture must come from their intercourse with us, and minds of a certain class will be stimulated to desire more; and all the barriers we put up will only serve to inflame curiosity, and will make them feel a perfect liberty to use the knowledge they conquer from us against us. In my opinion, the only sure defence against insurrection is systematic education, by which we shall acquire that influence over their minds which our superior intelligence will enable us to hold. Then, as fast as they become fitted to enjoy rights, we must grant them.'

'Not we, indeed!' said Mr. Knapp, striking his cane upon the floor. 'We are not going to lay down our power in that way. We will not allow any such beginning. We must hold them down firmly and consistently. For my part, I dislike even the system of oral religious instruction—it starts their minds and leads them to want something more; it's indiscreet, and I always said so. As for teaching them out of the Bible, why, the Bible is the most exciting book that ever was put together; it always starts up the mind, and it's unsafe.'

'Don't you see,' said Clayton, 'what an admission you are making? What sort of a system must this be that requires such a course to sustain it!'

'I can't help that,' said Mr. Knapp. 'There are millions and millions invested in it, and we can't afford to risk such an amount of property for mere abstract speculation. The system is as good as forty other systems that have prevailed, and will prevail. We can't take the framework of society to pieces; we must proceed with things as they are. And now, Mr. Clayton, another thing I have to say to you,' said he, looking excited, and getting up and walking the floor. 'It has been discovered that you receive incendiary documents through the post-office, and this cannot be permitted, sir.'

The colour flushed into Clayton's face, and his eye kindled as he braced himself in his chair. 'By what right, sir,' said he, 'does any one pry into what I receive through the post-office? Am I not a free man?'

'No, sir, you are not,' said Mr. Knapp; 'not free to receive that which may imperil a whole neighborhood; you are not free to store barrels of gunpowder on your premises, when they may blow up ours. Sir, we are obliged to hold the mail under supervision in this state, and suspected persons will not be allowed to receive communications without oversight. Don't you remember, sir, that the general post-office was broken open in Charleston, and all the abolition documents taken out of the mail-bags and consumed, and a general meeting of all the most respectable citizens, headed by the clergy in their robes of office, solemnly confirmed the deed?"

'I think, Mr. Knapp,' said Judge Oliver, interposing in a milder tone, 'that your excitement is carrying you farther than you are aware. I should rather hope that Mr. Clayton would perceive the reasonableness of our demand, and of himself forego the taking of these incendiary documents.'

'I take no incendiary documents,' said Clayton, warmly. 'It is true I take an anti-slavery paper, edited at Washington, in which the subject is fairly and coolly discussed. I hold it no more than every man's duty to see both sides of a question.'

'Well, then,' said Mr. Knapp, 'you see now the disadvantage of having your slaves taught to read. If they could not read your papers, it would be no matter what you took; but to have them get to reasoning on these subjects, and spread their reasonings through our plantations, why there'll be the devil to pay at once.'

'You must be sensible,' said Judge Oliver, 'that there must be some individual rights which we resign for the public good. I have looked over the paper you speak of, and I acknowledge it seems to me very fair; but then, in our peculiar and critical position, it might prove dangerous to have such reading about my house, and I never have it.'

'In that case,' said Clayton, 'I wonder you don't suppress your own newspapers; for as long as there is a congressional discussion, or a fourth of July oration, or senatorial speech in them, so long they are full of incendiary excitement to slaves: our history is full of it—our state bills of rights are full of it—the lives of our fathers are full of it; we must suppress our whole literature, if we would avoid it.'

'Now, don't you see,' said Mr. Knapp, 'you have stated just so many reasons why slaves must not learn to read?'

'To be sure I do,' said Clayton, 'if they are always to remain slaves—if we are never to have any views of emancipation for them.'

'Well, they are to remain slaves,' said Mr. Knapp, speaking with excitement, 'their condition is a finality; we will not allow the subject to be discussed.'

'Then, God have mercy on you!' said Clayton, solemnly; 'for it is my firm belief, that, in resisting the progress of human freedom, you will be found fighting against God.'

'Tisn't the cause of human freedom,' said Mr. Knapp, hastily, 'they are not human, they are an inferior race, made expressly for subjection and servitude; the Bible teaches this plainly.'

'Why don't you teach them to read it, then?' said Clayton, coolly.

'The long and short of the matter is, Mr. Clayton,' said Mr. Knapp, walking nervously up and down the room, 'you'll find this is not a matter to be trifled with; we come as your friends to warn you, and if you don't listen to our warnings, we shall not hold ourselves responsible for what may follow; you ought to have some consideration for your sister, if not for yourself.'

'I confess,' said Clayton, 'I had done the chivalry of South Carolina the honour to think that a lady could have nothing to fear.'

'It is so generally,' said Judge Oliver; 'but on this subject there is such a dreadful excitability in the public mind that we cannot control it. You remember when the senator from Massachusetts was sent to Charleston, he came with his daughter, a very cultivated and elegant young lady; but the mob was rising and we could not control it, and we had to go and beg them to leave the city. I for one wouldn't have been at all answerable for the consequences if they had remained.'

'I must confess Judge Oliver,' said Clayton, 'that I have been surprised this morning to hear South Carolinians palliating such events in your history as the breaking open of the Post-office, and the insult to the senator of a sister state who came in the most peaceable and friendly spirit, and insult to womanhood in the person of an accomplished lady—all by mob violence. Is this hydra-headed monster, the mob, to be our governor?'

'Oh, it is only upon this subject,' said all three of the gentlemen at once; 'this subject is exceptional.'

'And do you think,' said Clayton,—

"You can set the land on fire
To burn just so high and no higher?"

'You may depend upon it you will find that you cannot. The mob that you smile on and encourage when it does work that suits you, will one day prove itself your master in a manner that will not like.'

‘Well now, Mr. Clayton,’ said Mr. Bradshaw, ‘you see this is a very disagreeable subject; but the fact is we came in a friendly way to you. We all appreciate personally the merits of your character and the excellence of your motives; but really, sir, there is an excitement rising, there is a state of the public mind which is getting every day more and more inflammable. I talked with Miss Anne on the subject some months ago, and expressed my feelings very fully, and now if you will ~~only~~ give us a pledge that you will pursue a different course we shall have something to take hold of to quiet the public mind. If you will just write and stop your paper for the present, and let it be understood that your plantation system is to be stopped, the thing will gradually cool itself off.’

‘Gentlemen,’ said Clayton, ‘you are asking a very serious thing from me—and one which requires reflection. If I am violating the direct laws of the state, and these laws are to be considered as still in vital force, there is certainly some question with regard to my course; but still, I have responsibilities for the moral and religious improvement of those under my care which are equally binding. I see no course but removal from the state.’

‘Of course we should be sorry,’ said Judge Oliver, ‘you should be obliged to do that—still, we trust you will see the necessity and our motives.’

‘Necessity is the tyrant’s plea, I believe,’ said Clayton, smiling.

‘At all events it is a strong one,’ said Judge Oliver, smiling also. ‘But I am glad we have had this conversation. I think it will enable me to pacify the minds of some of our hot-headed young neighbours, and prevent threatened mischief.’

After a little general conversation, the party separated on apparently friendly terms, and Clayton went to seek counsel with his sister and Frank Russel.

Anne was indignant—with that straight out and generous indignation which belongs to women, who, generally speaking, are ready to follow their principles to any result with more inconsiderate fearlessness than men. She had none of the anxieties for herself that Clayton had for her. Having once been witness of the brutalities of a slave-mob, Clayton could not without a shudder connect any such possibilities with his sister.

‘I think,’ said Anne, ‘we had better give up this miserable sham of a free government—of freedom of speech, freedom of conscience, and all that—if things must go on in this way.’

‘Oh,’ said Frank Russel, ‘the fact is, that our republic in these states is like that of Venice—it's not a democracy, but an oligarchy, and the mob is its standing army. We are, all of us, under the Council of Ten, which has its eyes everywhere. We are free enough as long as our actions please them; when they don't we shall find their noose around our necks. It's very edifying, certainly, to have these gentlemen call on you, to tell you that they will not be answerable for consequences of excitement which they are all the time stirring up; for, after all, who cares what you do if they don't? The large proprietors are the ones interested, the rabble are their hounds; and this warning about popular excitement just means, "Sir, if you don't take care, I shall turn out my dogs, and then I won't be answerable for consequences."

'And you call this liberty!' said Anne, indignantly.

'O, well,' said Russel, 'this is a world of humbugs. We call it liberty, because that's an agreeable name. After all, what is liberty, that people make such a breeze about? It's only a pretty name. We are all slaves to one thing or another; nobody is absolutely free, except Robinson Crusoe in the desolate island, and he tears all his shirts to pieces, and hangs them up as signals of distress, in his distracted desire to get back into slavery.'

'For all that,' said Anne, warming, 'I know there is such a thing as liberty. All that nobleness and enthusiasm which has animated people in all ages for liberty cannot be in vain. Who does not thrill at those words of the Marseillaise?—

"Oh liberty! can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy generous flame?
Can dungeons, bolts, or bars confine thee?
Or whips thy noble spirit tame?"

Is there no reality in all that?"

'These are certainly agreeable myths,' said Russel; 'but these things will not bear any close looking into. Liberty generally means the liberty of me and my nation or my class to do what we please; which is a very pleasant thing certainly to those who are on the upper side of the wheel, and probably involving much that's disagreeable to those who are under.'

'That is a heartless, unbelieving way of talking,' said Anne, with tears in her eyes; 'but I know better. I know there have been some right, true, noble souls, in whom the love of liberty has meant the love of right, and the desire that every human brother should have what rightly belongs to him. It is not my liberty, nor our liberty, but the principle of liberty itself that they strive for.'

‘Such a principle, carried out logically, would make smashing work with this world,’ said Russel. ‘In this sense, where is there a free government on earth? What nation ever does or ever did respect the rights of the weaker, or ever will till the millennium comes? and that’s too far off to be of use in practical calculations. So don’t let’s break our hearts about a name; for my part I am more concerned about these implied threats. As I said before, the hand of Joab is in this thing. Tom Gordon is visiting in this neighbourhood; and you may depend upon it that this, in some way, comes from him: he is a perfectly reckless fellow, and I am afraid of some act of violence if he should bring up a mob. Whatever they do there will be no redress for you. Those respectable gentlemen, your best friends, will fold their hands, and say, “Poor fellow, we told him so!” While others will put their hands complacently in their pockets, and say, “Served him right!”’

‘I think,’ said Clayton, ‘there will be no immediate violence. I understood that they pledged as much when they parted.’

‘If Tom Gordon is in the camp,’ said Russel, ‘they may find that they have reckoned without their host in promising that. There are two or three young fellows in this vicinity, who, with his energy to direct them, are reckless enough for anything, and there is always an abundance of excitable rabble to be got for a drink of whiskey.’

The event proved that Russel was right.

Anne’s bedroom was in the back part of the cottage, opposite the little grove where stood her school-room. She was awaked about one o’clock that night by a broad, ruddy glare of light, which caused her at first to start from her bed with the impression that the house was on fire.

At the same instant she perceived that the air was full of barbarous and dissonant sounds, such as the beating of tin pans, the braying of horns, and shouts of savage merriment, intermingled with slang oaths and curses. In a moment recovering herself, she perceived that it was her school-house which was in a blaze; the flames crisping and shrivelling the foliage of the beautiful trees by which it was surrounded, and filling the air with a lurid light. She hastily dressed, and in a few moments Clayton and Russel knocked at her door; both were looking very pale.

‘Don’t be alarmed,’ said Clayton, putting his arm around her, with that manner which shows that there is everything to fear. ‘I am going out to speak to them.’

‘Indeed, you are going to do no such thing,’ said Frank Russel, decidedly; 'this is no time for any extra displays of heroism. These men are insane with whiskey and excitement—they have probably been especially inflamed against you, and your presence would irritate them still more. Let me go out. I understand the ignoble vulgar better than you do. Besides which, providentially, I haven't any conscience, to prevent my saying and doing what is necessary for an emergency: you shall see me lead off this whole yelling pack at my heels in triumph. And now, Clayton, you take care of Anne, like a good fellow, till I come back, which may be about four or five o'clock to-morrow morning. I shall take all these fellows down to Muggins, and leave them so drunk they cannot stand for one three hours.'

So saying, Frank proceeded hastily to disguise himself in a shaggy, old greatcoat, and to tie around his throat an old bandanna silk handkerchief, with a very fiery and dashing tie; and surmounting these equipments by an old hat, which had belonged to one of the servants, he stole out of the front door, and passing round through the shrubbery, was very soon lost in the throng who surrounded the burning building. He soon satisfied himself that Tom Gordon was not personally among them; that they consisted entirely of the lower class of whites.

'So far, so good,' he said to himself; and springing on to the stump of a tree, he commenced a speech in that peculiar slang dialect, which was vernacular with them, and of which he perfectly well understood the use. With his quick and ready talent for drollery, he soon had them around him in paroxysms of laughter; and complimenting their bravery, flattering and cajoling their vanity, he soon got them completely in his power, and they assented with a triumphant shout to the proposition that they should go down and celebrate their victory at Muggins' grocery, a low haunt, about a mile distant, whither, as he predicted, they triumphantly followed him; and he was as good as his word in not leaving them till they were so completely under the power of liquor, as to be incapable of mischief for the time being.

About nine o'clock the next day he returned, finding Clayton and Anne seated together at breakfast.

'Now, Clayton,' he said, seating himself, 'I am going to talk to you in good solemn earnest for once. The fact is, you are check-mated. Your plans for gradual emancipation or reform, or anything tending in that direction, are utterly hopeless; and if you wish to preserve them with your own people, you must either send them to Liberia or to the northern states. There was a time, fifty years ago, when such things were contemplated with some degree of sincerity by all the leading minds at the South—that time is over; from the very day that they began to open new territories to slavery, the value of this kind of property mounted up so as to make emancipation a moral impossibility. It is, as they told you, a finality; and don't you see how they make everything in the Union bend to it? Why these proprietors are only about three-tenths of the population of our southern states, and yet the other seven-tenths virtually have no existence, all they do is to vote as they are told, as they know they must, being too ignorant to know any better. The mouth of the North is stuffed with cotton, and will be kept full as long as it suits us. Good easy gentlemen! they are so satisfied with their pillows and other accommodations inside of the car that they don't trouble themselves to reflect that we are the engineers, nor to ask where we are going. And when any one does wake up and pipe out a melancholy inquiry, we slam the door in his face, and tell him—"Mind your own business, sir;" and he leans back on his cotton pillow, and goes to sleep again; only whimpering a little that we "might be more polite." They have their fanatics up there. We don't trouble ourselves to put them down. We make them do it. They get up mobs on our account to root troublesome ministers and editors out of their cities, and their men that they send to Congress invariably have done all our dirty work. There's now and then an exception, it is true, but they only prove the rule. If there were any public sentiment at the North for you reformers to fall back upon, you might, in spite of your difficulties, do something; but there is not. They are all implicated with us, except the class of born fanatics like you, who are walking in that very unfashionable narrow way we all hear of occasionally at church.'

'Well,' said Anne, 'let us go out of the state, then. I will go anywhere, but I will not stop the work I have begun.'

CHAPTER LVI.

FLIGHT AND LIBERTY.

THE party of fugitives which started for the North was divided into two bands.

Harry, Lisette, Tiff and his two children, assumed the character of a family, of whom Harry took the part of the father, Lisette the nurse, and Tiff the man-servant. The money which Clayton had given them enabling them to furnish a respectable outfit, they found no difficulty in taking passage under this character at Norfolk on board a small coasting vessel bound for New York. Never had Harry known a moment so full of joyous security as that which found him out at sea in a white-winged vessel flying with all speed toward a distant port of safety.

Before they reached the coast of New York, however, there was a change in their prospects. The blue sky became darkened, and the sea, before so treacherously smooth, began to rise in furious waves. The little vessel was tossed baffling about by contrary and tumultuous winds.

When she began to pitch and roll in all the violence of a decided storm, Lisette and the children cried for fear. Old Tiff exerted himself for their comfort to the best of his ability. Seated on the cabin-floor with his feet firmly braced, he would hold the children in his arms, and remind them of what Miss Nina had read to them of the storm that came down on the lake of Gennesaret, and how Jesus was in the hinder part of the boat, asleep on a pillow, 'and he's thar yet,' he would say.

'I wish they'd wake him up then,' said Teddy, disconsolately; 'I don't like this dreadful noise; what does he let it be so for?'

Before the night of that day the distress of the ship increased, and the horrors of that night can only be told by those who have felt the like. The plunging of the ship, the creaking and straining of the timbers, the hollow and sepulchral sound of waves striking against the hull, and the shiver with which, like a living creature, she seemed to tremble at every shock, were things frightful even to the experienced sailor, much more so to our trembling fugitives.

The morning dawned only to show the sailors the ship drifting helplessly on to a fatal shore, whose name is a sound of evil omen to seamen. It was not long before the final crash came, and the ship was wedged among rugged rocks, washed over every moment by the fury of the waves. All hands came now on deck for the last chance of life. One boat after another was attempted to be launched, but was swamped by the furious waters. When the last boat was to be launched there was a general rush of all on board. It was the last chance for life. In such hours the instinctive fear of death often overbears every other consideration, and the boat was rapidly filled by the hands of the ship, who, being strongest and most accustomed to such situations, were able to effect this with more ease than the passengers. The captain alone remained standing on the wreck, and with him Harry, Lisette, Tiff, and the children.

'Pass along,' said the captain, hastily seizing and tossing Lisette on board, simply because she was the first that came under his hands.

'For de good Lord's sake,' said Tiff, 'put de chil'en aboard; dere won't be no room for me, and 'tant no matter. You go board and take good care on 'em,' he said, pushing Harry along.

Harry mechanically sprang into the boat and the captain after him; the boat was full.

'Oh! do take poor Tiff, do!' said the children, stretching their hands after their old friend.

'Clear away, boys; the boat's full,' shouted a dozen voices; and the boat parted from the wreck and sunk in eddies and whirls of boiling waves and foam and spray, as it went rising and sinking onward, driven towards the shore.

Looking backwards they saw a mighty green wave come roaring and shaking its crested head, and lift the hull as if it had been an egg-shell, then dash it in fragments against the rocks.

This was all they knew till they were themselves cast wet and dripping, but still living, upon the sands.

A crowd of people were gathered upon the shore, who, with the natural kindness of humanity on such occasions, gathered the drenched and sea-beaten wanderers into neighbouring cottages, where food and fire and change of dry clothing awaited them.

The children excited universal sympathy and attention, and so many mothers of the neighborhood came bringing offerings of clothing, that their lost wardrobe was soon very tolerably replaced; but nothing could comfort them for the loss of their old friend. In vain the 'little dears' were tempted with offers of cake and custard, and every imaginable eatable; they sat with their arms around each other, quietly weeping.

No matter how unsightly the casket may be which holds all the love there is on earth for us—be that love lodged in the heart of the poorest and most uneducated, the whole world can offer no exchange for it.

Tiff's devotion to these children had been so constant, so provident and absolute, that it did not seem to them possible they could live a day without him, and the desolation of their lot seemed to grow upon them every hour. Nothing would restrain them—they would go out and look up and down, if perhaps they might meet him, but they searched in vain ; and Harry, who had attended them, led them back again disconsolate.

‘I say, Fanny,’ said Teddy, after they had said their prayers and lain down in their little bed, ‘has Tiff gone to heaven?’

‘Certainly he has,’ said Fanny, ‘if ever anybody went there.’

‘Won’t he come and bring us pretty soon?’ said Teddy. ‘He won’t want to be there without us, will he?’

‘Oh, I don’t know,’ said Fanny. ‘I wish we could go, the world is so lonesome.’

And thus talking, the children fell asleep. But it is written in an ancient record, ‘Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning;’ and early the next morning Teddy started up in bed:

‘Oh, Fanny! Fanny! Tiff isn’t dead; I heard him laughing!’

Fanny started up, and, sure enough, there came through the partition which separated their little sleeping-room from the kitchen, a sound very much like Tiff’s old unctuous laugh. One would have thought no other pair of lungs could have rolled out the jolly ‘Ho! ho! ho!’ with such a joyous fulness of intonation.

The children hastily put on their clothes, and opened the door.

‘Why, bress de Lord, poppets! here dey is, sure enough! Ho! ho! ho!’ said Tiff, stretching out his arms, while both the children ran and hung upon him.

‘Oh, Tiff! we are so glad! Oh, we thought you was drowned! we’ve been thinking so all night.’

‘No, no, no, bress de Lord! you don’t get shet of old Tiff dat ar way. Won’t get shet of him till ye’s fetched up, and able to do for yourselves,’ said Tiff, shaking his sides joyously.

‘Oh, Tiff! how did you get away?’

‘Lays, chil’en! t’was a mighty straight way. I told de Lord ’bout it. Says I, “Good Lord, you knows I don’t car’ nothing ’bout it on my own ’count; but ’pears like dese yer chil’en is so young and tender, I couldn’t leave ’em no way;” and so I ax’d Him if he wouldn’t just please to help me, ’cause I know’d he had de power of de winds and de sea. Well, sure ’nuf, dat ar big wave toted me clar up, right on de sho’, and here I is! But it tuk my bref and my senses so, I didn’t furly know where I was; and de people dat found me, dey toted me off a good bit away to a house down here, and dey was ’mazing good to me, and rubbed me wid de hot flannels, and gin me ope thing and another; so I woke up quite peart dis mornin,’ and came out to look up my poppets, ’cause, you see, it was kinder borne on my mind dat I should find yo' all; and now, ye see, chil'en, you mark my words. De Lord's been wid us in six troubles, and in seven; and He'll bring us to good luck yet. Tell ye de sca han't washed dat ar' out o' me, for all its banging and bruising.'

And Tiff chuckled in the fulness of his heart, and made a joyful noise. His words were so far accomplished, that before many days the little party, rested and refreshed, and with the losses of their wardrobe made up by friendly contributions, found themselves under the roof of some benevolent friends in New York.

Thither in due time the other detachment of their party arrived, which had come forward under the guidance of Hannibal, by ways and means which, as they may be wanted for others in like circumstances, we shall not further particularize.

Harry, by the kind patronage of friends, soon obtained employment, which placed him and his wife in a situation of comfort. Milly and her grandson, old Tiff and his children, were enabled to live in a humble tenement together; and she, finding employment as a pastry-cook in a confectioner's establishment, was able to provide a very comfortable support, while Tiff presided in the housekeeping department.

After a year or two an event occurred of so romantic a nature, that had we not ascertained it as a positive fact, we should hesitate to insert it in our veracious narrative. Fanny's mother had an aunt in the Peyton family, a maiden lady of very singular character, who by habits of great penuriousness had amassed a large fortune, apparently for no other purpose than that it should some day fall into the hands of somebody who would know how to enjoy it. Having quarrelled shortly before her death with all her other relatives, she cast about in her mind for ways and means to revenge herself on them, by placing her property out of their disposal in case of her death. She accordingly made a will bequeathing it to the heirs of her niece, Fanny's mother, if any such existed; and if not, the property was to go to an orphan asylum. By chance the lawyer's letter of inquiry was addressed to Clayton, who immediately took the necessary measures to identify the children and put them in possession of the property.

'Tiff now was glorious. 'He always know'd it,' he said, 'dat Miss Sue's chil'en would come to luck, and dat de Lord would open a door for dem, and he had.'

Fanny, who was now a well-grown girl of twelve years, chose Clayton as her guardian, and by his care she was placed at one of the best New England schools, where her mind and her person developed rapidly.

Her brother was placed at school in the same town.

As for Clayton, after some inquiry and consideration, he bought a large and valuable tract of land in that portion of Canada where the climate is least severe, and the land the most valuable for culture.

To this place he removed his slaves, and formed there a township, which is now one of the richest and finest in the region.* Here he built for himself a beautiful residence, where he and his sister live happily together, finding their enjoyment in the improvement of those by whom they are surrounded. It is a striking comment on the success of Clayton's enterprise, that the neighbouring white settlers, who at first looked coldly upon him, fearing he would be the means of introducing a thriftless population among them, have been entirely won over, and that the value of the improvements, which Clayton and his tenants have made, has nearly doubled the price of real estate in the vicinity.

So high a character have his schools borne, that the white settlers in the vicinity have discontinued their own, preferring to have their children enjoy the advantages of those under his and his sister's care and patronage.

Harry is one of the head men of the settlement, and is rapidly acquiring property and consideration in the community.

A large farm, waving with some acres of fine wheat, with its fences and out-houses in excellent condition, marks the energy and thrift of Hannibal, who, instead of slaying men, is great in felling trees and clearing forests. He finds time, winter evenings, to read, with 'none to molest or make him afraid.' His eldest son is construing 'Cæsar's Commentaries' at school, and often reads his lessons of an evening to his delighted father, who willingly resigns the palm of scholarship into his hands.

As to our merry friend, Jim, he is the life of the settlement. Liberty, it is true, has made him a little more sober, and a very energetic and capable wife soberer still; but yet Jim has enough, and to spare, of drollery, which makes him an indispensable requisite in all social gatherings.

He works on his farm with energy, and repels with indignation any suggestion that he was happier in the old time, when he had abundance of money and very little to do.

* The facts stated about this settlement are all true of that called the Elgin settlement in the south of Canada, founded by Mr. King, formerly a slaveholder in Mississippi.

One suggestion more we almost hesitate to make, lest it should give rise to unfounded reports, but we are obliged to speak the truth.

Anne Clayton, on a visit to a friend's family in New Hampshire, met with Livy Ray, of whom she had heard Nina speak so much; and, very naturally, the two ladies fell into a most intimate friendship: visits were exchanged between them, and Clayton, on the introduction, discovered the lady he had met in the prison in Alexandria.

The most intimate friendship exists between the three, and of course in such cases reports will arise; but, we assure our readers, we have never heard of any authentic foundation for them, so that in this matter we can clearly leave every one to predict a result according to their own fancies.

CHAPTER LVII.

CLEAR SHINING AFTER RAIN.

CLAYTON had occasion to visit New York on business. He never went without carrying some token of remembrance from the friends in his settlement to Milly; now, indeed, far advanced in years, while, in the expressive words of Scripture, 'Her eye was not dim, nor her natural force abated.'

He found her in a neat little tenement in one of the outer streets of New York, surrounded by about a dozen children, among whom were blacks, whites, and foreigners. These she rescued from utter destitution in the streets, and was giving to them all the attention and affection of a mother.

'Why, bless you, sir,' she said to Clayton, pleasantly, as she opened the door, 'it's good to see you once more; how's Miss Anne?'

'Very well, Milly. She sent you this little packet, and you will find something from Harry and Lisette, and all the rest of your friends in our settlement. Ah! are these all your children, Milly?'

'Yes, honey—mine and de Lord's; dis yer's my second dozen; de fust is all in good places and doing well—I keeps my eye on 'em, and goes round to see after 'em a little now and then.'

'And how is Tomtit?'

Oh, Tomtit's doing beautiful, thankee, sir. He's 'come a Christian and joined the Church, and dey has him to wait and 'tend at de Anti-Slavery office, and he does well.'

'I see you have black and white here,' said Clayton, glancing around the circle.

'Laws, yes,' said Milly, looking complacently around, 'I don't make no distinction of colour, I don't believe in dem; white children, when dey 'haves themselves is just as good as black, and I loves 'em just as well.'

'Don't you sometimes think it a little hard you should have to work so in your old age?'

'Why, bless you, honey, no. I takes heaps of comfort of ~~my~~ money as I goes along. Dere's heaps in me yet,' she said, laughing. 'I'se hoping to get dis yer batch put out and take in another afore I die. You see,' she said, 'dis yer's de way I took to get my heart whole. I found it was getting so sore, for my chil'en I'd had took from me. 'Pears like the older I grow'd the more I thought about 'em; but long as I keeps doing for chil'en it kinder eases it. I calls 'em all mine; so I'se got good many chil'en now.'

We will inform our readers in passing, that Milly in the course of her life, on the humble wages of a labouring woman, took from the streets, brought up, and placed in respectable situations, no less than forty destitute children.*

When Clayton returned to Boston, he received a note, written in a graceful female hand, from Fanny, expressing her gratitude for his kindness to her and her brother, and begging that he would come and spend a day with them at their cottage in the vicinity of the city.

Accordingly eight o'clock the next morning found him whirling in the cars through green fields and pleasant meadows garlanded with flowers and draped with bending elms, to one of those graceful villages which lie like pearls on the bosom of our fair old mother, Massachusetts. Stopping at N— station he inquired his way up to a little eminence which commanded a view of one of those charming lakes which open their blue eyes everywhere through the New England landscape. Here, embowered in blossoming trees, stood a little Gothic cottage—a perfect gem of rural irregularity and fanciful beauty. A porch in the front of it was supported on pillars of cedar with the rough bark still on, around which were trained multitudes of climbing roses now in full flower. From the porch a rustic bridge led across a little ravine into a summer-house. This little harbour was built like a nest in the branches of a great oak which grew up from the hollow below.

A light form, dressed in a pretty white wrapper, came fluttering across the bridge as Clayton ascended the steps of the porch. Perhaps our readers may recognize in the smoothly-parted brown hair, the large blue eyes, and the bashful earnestness of the face, our sometime little friend Fanny; and if they do not, they'll be familiar with the cheery 'Ho, ho, ho,' which comes from the porch, as our old friend Tiff, dressed in a respectable suit of black, comes bowing forward.

'Bress de Lord, masser Clayton, it's good for de eyes to look at you. So you're come to see Miss Fanny, now she's come to her property, and got de place she ought for to have. Ha, ha! old Tiff always knowed it! He see'd it. He knowed de Lord would bring her out right!—and He did. Ho! ho! ho!'

'Yes,' said Fanny, 'and I sometimes think I don't enjoy it half as well as uncle Tiff. I'm sure he ought to have some comfort of us, for he worked hard enough for us. Didn't you, uncle Tiff?'

'Work, bress your soul, didn't I?' said Tiff, giggling all over in cheerful undulations; 'reckon I has worked, though I doesn't have much of it to do now; but I sees good of my work now days—does so. Masser Teddy his grow'd up tall and handsome young gentleman, and he's in college. Only think of dat! Laws, he can make de Latin fly! Dis yer's pretty good country too; der's families round here dats most up to old Virginny, and she goes with de best of 'em.'

Fanny now led Clayton into the house; and, while she tripped up stairs to change her morning dress, Tiff busied himself in arranging cake and fruit on a silver salver as an apology for remaining in the room.

He seemed to consider the interval as an appropriate one for making some confidential communication on a subject that lay very near his heart; so, after looking out of the door with an air of great mystery, to ascertain that Miss Fanny was really gone, he returned to Clayton, and touched him on the elbow with an air of infinite secrecy and precaution.

'Dis yer an't to be spoke of out loud,' said he. 'I'se been mighty anxious; but, bress de Lord, I'se come safe thro', 'cause you see I'se found out he's a right likely man, besides being one of de very fustest old families in de state; and dese yere old families here is 'bout as good as dey was in ole Virginny; and, when all's said and done, it's de man dats de ting arter all, 'cause Miss Fanny can't marry all de generations back, if dey's ever so nice; but he is one of our likeliest men.'

"What's his name?" said Clayton.

'Seymour,' said Tiff, lifting up his hand apprehensively to his mouth, and shouting out the name in a loud whisper. 'I reckon he'll be here to-day, 'cause masser Teddy's coming home, and going to bring him wid him. So please, masser Clayton, you won't notice nothing, 'cause Miss Fanny is, she's jest like her ma, she'll turn red clar up to her har if a body only looks at her. See here,' said Tiff, fumbling in his pocket, and producing a spectacle-case, out of which he produced a portentous pair of gold-mounted spectacles. 'See what he gin me de last time he's here. I puts dese here on of a Sundays when I sits down to read my Bible.'

'Indeed!' said Clayton, 'have you learned then to read?'

'Why, no honey, I donno as I can rightly say dat I'se larn'd to read, caus I'se 'mazing slow at dat ar; but den I'se larn'd all de best words—like Christ, and Lord, and God, and dem ar—and when dey's pretty thick I makes out quite comfortable.'

We shall not detain our readers with minute description of how the day was spent. How Teddy came home from college, a tall handsome fellow, and rattled over Latin and Greek sentences in Tiff's delighted ears, who considered his learning as, without doubt, the eighth wonder of the world. Nor how George Seymour came with him, a handsome senior just graduated; nor how Fanny blushed and trembled, when she told her guardian her little secret, and, like other ladies, asked advice after she had made up her mind. Nor shall we dilate on the yet brighter glories of the cottage, three months after, when Clayton, and Anne, and Livy Ray were all at the wedding, and Tiff became, three or four times blessed in this brilliant consummation of his hopes.

The last time we saw him, he was walking forth in magnificence, his gold spectacles set conspicuously astride of his nose trundling a little wicker wagon, which cradled a fair pearly little Miss Fanny, whom he informed all beholders, was 'de bery sperit of de Peytons.'

APPENDIX I.

NAT TURNER'S CONFESSIONS.

As an illustration of the character and views ascribed to Dred, we make a few extracts from the Confessions of Nat Turner, as published by T. R. Gray, Esq., of Southampton, Virginia, in November 1831. One of the principal conspirators in this affair was named Dred.

We will first give the certificate of the Court and a few sentences from Mr. Gray's introductory remarks, and then proceed with Turner's own narrative.

We, the undersigned, members of the Court convened at Jerusalem, on Saturday, the 5th day of Nov. 1831, for the trial of Nat, alias Nat Turner, a negro slave, late the property of Putnam Moore, deceased, do hereby certify, that the confessions of Nat, to Thomas R. Gray, were read to him in our presence, and that Nat acknowledged the same to be full, free, and voluntary; and that furthermore, when called upon by the presiding magistrate of the Court to state if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, replied he had nothing further than he had communicated to Mr. Gray. Given under our hands and seals at Jerusalem, this 5th day of November, 1831.

State of Virginia, Southampton County, to wit:

I, James Rochelle, Clerk of the County Court of Southampton, in the state of Virginia, do hereby certify, that Jeremiah Cobb, Thomas Pretlow, James W. Parker, Carr Bowers, Samuel B. Hines, and Orris A. Browne, esqrs., are acting justices of the peace, in and for the county aforesaid; and were members of the Court which convened at Jerusalem, on Saturday, the 5th day of November, 1831, for the trial of Nat, alias Nat Turner, a negro slave, late the property of Putnam Moore, deceased, who was tried and convicted, as an insurgent in the late insurrection in the county of Southampton aforesaid, and that full faith and credit are due, and ought to be given to their acts as justices of the peace aforesaid.

(Seal.)

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the Court aforesaid to be affixed this 5th day of November, 1831.

JAMES ROCHELLE, C. S. C. C.

"Everything connected with this sad affair was wrapt in mystery, until NAT TURNER, the leader of this ferocious band, whose name has resounded throughout our widely-extended empire, was captured.

"Since his confinement, by permission of the gaoler, I have had ready access to him, and finding that he was willing to make a full and free confession of the origin, progress, and consummation of the insurrectory movements of the slaves, of which he was the contriver and head, I determined, for the gratification of public curiosity, to commit his statements to writing, and publish them, with little or no variation, from his own words.

"He was not only the contriver of the conspiracy, but gave the first blow towards its execution.

"It will thus appear, that whilst everything upon the surface of society wore a calm and peaceful aspect; whilst not one note of preparation was heard to warn the devoted inhabitants of woe and death, a gloomy fanatic was revolving in the recesses of his own dark, bewildered, and overwrought mind, schemes of indiscriminate massacre to the whites. Schemes too fearfully executed, as far as his fiendish hand proceeded in their desolating march. No cry for mercy penetrated their flinty bosoms. No acts of remembered kindness made the least impression upon these remorseless murderers. Men, women, and children, from hoary age to helpless infancy, were involved in the same cruel fate. Never did a band of savages do their work of death more unsparingly.

"Nat has survived all his followers, and the gallows will speedily close his career. His own account of the conspiracy is submitted to the public without comment. It reads an awful, and, it is hoped, a useful lesson, as to the operations of a mind like his, endeavouring to grapple with things beyond its reach. How it first became bewildered and confounded, and finally corrupted and led to the conception and perpetration of the most atrocious and heart-rending deeds.

"If Nat's statements can be relied on, the insurrection in this county was entirely local, and his designs confided but to a few, and these in his immediate vicinity. It was not instigated by motives of revenge or sudden anger, but the results of long deliberation, and a settled purpose of mind—the offspring of gloomy fanaticism acting upon materials but too well prepared for such impressions."

"I was thirty-one years of age the 2nd of October last, and born the property of Benj. Turner, of this county. In my childhood a circumstance occurred which made an indelible impression on my mind, and laid the groundwork of that enthusiasm, which has terminated so fatally to many both white and black, and for which I am about to atone at the gallows. It is here necessary to relate this circumstance—trifling as it may seem, it was the commencement of that belief which has grown with time, and even now, sir, in this dungeon, helpless and forsaken as I am, I cannot divest myself of. Being at play with other children, when three or four years old, I was telling them something, which my mother overhearing, said it had happened before I was born—I stuck to my story, however, and related some things which went in her opinion to confirm it—others being called on were greatly astonished, knowing that these things had happened, and caused them to say in my hearing, I surely would be a prophet, as the Lord had shown me things that had happened before my birth. And my father and mother strengthened me in this my first impression, saying in my presence, I was intended for some great purpose, which they had always thought from certain marks on my head and breast—[a parcel of excrescences which I believe are not at all uncommon, particularly among negroes, as I have seen several with the same. In this case he has either cut them off, or they have nearly disappeared.]—My grandmother, who was very religious, and to whom I was much attached—my master, who belonged to the church, and other religious persons who visited the house, and whom I often saw at prayers—noticing the singularity of my manners, I suppose, and my uncommon intelligence for a child, remarked I had too much sense to be raised, and if I was, I would never be of any service to any one as a slave. To a mind like mine, restless, inquisitive, and observant of everything that was passing, it is easy to suppose that religion was the subject to which it would be directed; and although this subject principally occupied my thoughts, there was nothing that I saw or heard of to which my attention was not directed. The manner in which I learned to read and write, not only had great influence on my own mind, as I acquired it with the most perfect ease, so much so, that I have no recollection whatever of learning the alphabet—but to the astonishment of the family, one day, when a book was shown me to keep me from crying, I began spelling the names of different objects—this was a source of wonder to all in the neighbourhood, particularly the blacks—and this learning was constantly improved at all opportunities. When I got large enough to go to work, while employed, I was reflecting on many things that would present themselves to my imagination, and whenever an opportunity occurred of looking at a book, when the school children were getting their lessons, I would find many things that the fertility of my own imagination had depicted to me before. All my time, not devoted to my master's service, was spent either in prayer, or in making experiments in casting different things in moulds made of earth, in attempting to make paper, gunpowder, and many other experiments, that although I could not perfect, yet convinced me of its practicability if I had the means.* I was not addicted to stealing in my youth, nor have ever been, yet such was the confidence of the negroes in the neighborhood, even at this early period of my life, in my superior judgment, that they would often carry me with them when they were going on any roguery, to plan for them. Growing up among them, with this confidence in my superior judgment, and when this, in their opinions, was perfected by Divine inspiration, from the circumstances already alluded to in my infancy, and which belief was ever afterwards zealously inculcated by the austerity of my life and manners, which became the subject of remark by white and black.—Having soon discovered to be great, I must appear so, and therefore studiously avoided mixing in society, and wrapped myself in mystery, devoting my time to fasting and prayer. By this time, having arrived to man's estate, and hearing the Scriptures commented on at meetings, I was struck with that particular passage which says: 'Seek ye the kingdom of Heaven, and all things shall be added unto you.' I reflected much on this passage, and prayed daily for light on this subject.—As I was praying one day at my plough, the Spirit spoke to me, saying, 'Seek ye the kingdom of Heaven, and all things shall be added unto you.' Question. 'What do you mean by the Spirit?' Answer. The

* When questioned as to the manner of manufacturing those different articles, he was found well-informed.

Spirit that spoke to the prophets in former days—and I was greatly astonished, and for two years prayed continually, whenever my duty would permit—and then again I had the same revelation, which fully confirmed me in the impression that I was ordained for some great purpose in the hands of the Almighty. Several years rolled round, in which many events occurred to strengthen me in this my belief. At this time I reverted in my mind to the remarks made of me in my childhood, and the things that had been shown me—and as it had been said of me in my childhood by those by whom I had been taught to pray, both white and black, and in whom I had the greatest confidence, that I had too much sense to be raised, and if I was I would never be of any use to any one as a slave. Now finding I had arrived to man's estate, and was a slave, and these revelations being made known to me, I began to direct my attention to this great object, to fulfil the purpose for which, by this time, I felt assured I was intended. Knowing the influence I had obtained over the minds of my fellow-servants, (not by the means of conjuring and such like tricks—for to them I always spoke of such things with contempt,) but by the communion of the Spirit whose revelations I often communicated to them, and they believed and said my wisdom came from God. I now began to prepare them for my purpose, by telling them something was about to happen that would terminate in fulfilling the great promise that had been made to me. About this time I was placed under an overseer, from whom I ran away, and after remaining in the woods thirty days—I returned, to the astonishment of the negroes on the plantation, who thought I had made my escape to some other part of the country, as my father had done before. But the reason of my return was, that the Spirit appeared to me and said I had my wishes directed to the things of this world, and not to the kingdom of Heaven, and that I should return to the service of my earthly master—‘For he who knoweth his Master's will, and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes, and thus have I chastened you.’ And the negroes found fault, and murmured against me, saying that if they had my sense they would not serve any master in the world. And about this time I had a vision—and I saw white spirits and black spirits engaged in battle, and the sun was darkened—the thunder rolled in the Heavens, and blood flowed in streams—and I heard a voice saying, ‘Such is your luck, such you are called to see, and let it come rough or smooth, you must surely bear it.’ I now withdrew myself, as much as my situation would permit, from the intercourse of my fellow-servants, for the avowed purpose of serving the Spirit more fully—and it appeared to me, and reminded me of the things it had already shown me, and that it would then reveal to me the knowledge of the elements, the revolution of the planets, the operation of tides, and changes of the seasons. After this revelation in the year 1825, and the knowledge of the elements being made known to me, I sought more than ever to obtain true holiness before the great day of judgment should appear; and then I began to receive the true knowledge of faith. And from the first steps of righteousness until the last, was I made perfect; and the Holy Ghost was with me, and said, ‘Behold me as I stand in the Heavens’—and I looked and saw the forms of men in different attitudes—and there were lights in the sky to which the children of darkness gave other names than what they really were, for they were the lights of the Saviour's hands, stretched forth from east to west, even as they were extended on the cross on Calvary for the redemption of sinners. And I wondered greatly at these miracles, and prayed to be informed of a certainty of the meaning thereof; and shortly afterwards, while labouring in the field, I discovered drops of blood on the corn, as though it were dew from heaven—and I communicated it to many, both white and black, in the neighbourhood—and I then found on the leaves in the woods hieroglyphic characters and numbers, with the forms of men in different attitudes, portrayed in blood, and representing the figures I had seen before in the heavens. And now the Holy Ghost had revealed itself to me, and made plain the miracles it had shown me; for as the blood of Christ had been shed on this earth, and had ascended to heaven for the salvation of sinners, and was now returning to earth again in the form of dew—and as the leaves on the trees bore the impression of the figures I had seen in the heavens—it was plain to me that the Saviour was about to lay down the yoke he had borne for the sins of men, and the great day of judgment was at hand. About this time I told these things to a white man (Etheldred T. Brantley), on whom it had a wonderful effect; and he ceased from his wickedness, and was attacked immediately with a cutaneous eruption, and blood oozed from the pores of his skin, and after praying and fasting nine days he was healed, and the Spirit appeared to me again, and said, as the Saviour had been baptized, so should we be also; and when the white people would not let us be baptized by the church, we went down into the water together, in the sight of many who reviled us, and were baptized by the Spirit. After this I rejoiced greatly, and gave thanks to God. And on the 12th of May, 1828, I heard a loud noise in the heavens, and the Spirit instantly appeared to me and said the Serpent was loosened, and Christ had laid down the yoke he had borne for the sins of men, and that I should take it on and fight against the Serpent, for the time was fast approaching when the first should be last and the last should be first. Ques. 'Do you not find yourself mistaken now?'—Ans. Was not Christ crucified? And by signs in the heavens that it would make known to me when I should commence the great work—and until the first sign appeared I should conceal it from the knowledge of men—and on the appearance of the sign (the eclipse of the sun, last February) I should arise and prepare myself, and slay my enemies with their own weapons. And immediately on the sign appearing in the heavens, the seal was removed from my lips, and I communicated the great work laid out for me to do, to four in whom I had the greatest confidence (Henry, Hark, Nelson, and Sam). It was intended by us to have begun the work of death on the 4th of July last. Many were the plans formed and rejected by us, and it affected my mind to such a degree that I fell sick, and the time passed without our coming to any determination how to commence—still forming new schemes and rejecting them, when the sign appeared again, which determined me not to wait longer.

"Since the commencement of 1830 I had been living with Mr. Joseph Travis, who was to me a kind master, and placed the greatest confidence in me; in fact, I had no cause to complain of his treatment of me. On Saturday evening, the 20th of August, it was agreed between Henry, Hark, and myself, to prepare a dinner the next day for the men we expected, and then to concert a plan, as we had not yet determined on any. Hark, on the following morning, brought a pig, and Henry brandy; and being joined by Sam, Nelson, Will, and Jack, they prepared in the woods a dinner, where, about three o'clock, I joined them.

"Q. Why were you so backward in joining them?

"A. The same reason that had caused me not to mix with them for years before.

"I saluted them on coming up, and asked Will how came he there; he answered, his life was worth no more than others, and his liberty as dear to him. I asked him if he thought to obtain it? He said he would, or lose his life. This was enough to put him in full confidence. Jack, I knew, was only a tool in the hands of Hark. It was quickly agreed we should commence at home (Mr. J. Travis') on that night, and until we had armed and equipped ourselves, and gathered sufficient force, neither age nor sex was to be spared, which was invariably adhered to. We remained at the feast until about two hours in the night, when we went to the house and found Austin."

We will not go into the horrible details of the various massacres, but only make one or two extracts to show the spirit and feelings of Turner.

"I then went to Mr. John T. Barrow's; they had been here and murdered him. I pursued on their track to Capt. Newit Harris', where I found the greater part mounted, and ready to start; the men now amounting to about forty, shouted and hurraed as I rode up, some were in the yard, loading their guns, others drinking. They said Captain Harris and his family had escaped; the property in the house they destroyed, robbing him of money and other valuables. I ordered them to mount and march instantly; this was about nine or ten o'clock, Monday morning. I proceeded to Mr. Levi Waller's, two or three miles distant. I took my station in the rear, and as it was my object to carry terror and devastation wherever we went, I placed fifteen or twenty of the best armed and most to be relied on in front, who generally approached the houses as fast as their horses could run; this was for two purposes—to prevent their escape and strike terror to the inhabitants; on this account I never got to the houses, after leaving Mrs. Whitehead's, until the murders were committed, except in one case. I sometimes got in sight in time to see the work of death completed, viewed the mangled bodies as they lay, in silent satisfaction, and immediately started in quest of other victims. Having murdered Mrs. Waller and ten children, we started for Mr. William Williams'—having killed him and two little boys that were there; while engaged in this, Mrs. Williams fled and got some distance from the house, but she was pursued, overtaken, and compelled to get up behind one of the company, who brought her back, and after showing her the mangled body of her lifeless husband, she was told to get down and lie by his side, where she was shot dead.

"The white men pursued and fired on us several times. Hark had his horse shot under him, and I caught another for him as it was running by me; five or six of my men were wounded, but none left on the field. Finding myself defeated here, I instantly determined to go through a private way, and cross the Nottoway River at the Cypress Bridge, three miles below Jerusalem, and attack that place in the rear, as I expected they would look for me on the other road, and I had a great desire to get there to procure arms and ammunition. After going a short distance in this private way, accompanied by about twenty men, I overtook two or three who told me the others were dispersed in every direction.

"On this I gave up all hope for the present; and on Thursday night, after having supplied myself with provisions from Mr. Travis's, I scratched a hole under a pile of fence-rails in a field, where I concealed myself for six weeks, never leaving my hiding-place but for a few minutes in the dead of the night to get water, which was very near. Thinking by this time I could venture out, I began to go about in the night and eaves-drop the houses in the neighbourhood: pursuing this course for about a fortnight, and gathering little or no intelligence, afraid of speaking to any human being, and returning every morning to my cave before the dawn of day. I know not how long I might have led this life, if accident had not betrayed me—a dog in the neighbourhood passing by my hiding-place one night while I was out, was attracted by some meat I had in my cave, and crawled in and stole it, and was coming out just as I returned. A few nights after, two negroes having started to go hunting with the same dog, and passed that way, the dog came again to the place, and having just gone out to walk about, discovered me and barked, on which, thinking myself discovered, I spoke to them to beg concealment. On making myself known, they fled from me. Knowing then they would betray me, I immediately left my hiding-place, and was pursued almost incessantly until I was taken a fortnight afterwards by Mr. Benjamin Phipps, in a little hole I had dug out with my sword, for the purpose of concealment, under the top of a fallen tree.

"During the time I was pursued, I had many hairbreadth escapes, which your time will not permit me to relate. I am here loaded with chains, and willing to suffer the fate that awaits me."

"Mr. Gray asked him if he knew of any extensive or concerted plan. His answer was, I do not. When I questioned him as to the insurrection in North Carolina happening about the same time, he denied any knowledge of it; and when I looked him in the face as though I would search his inmost thoughts, he replied, 'I see, sir, you doubt my word; but can you not think the same ideas, and strange appearances about this time in the heavens might prompt others, as well as myself, to this undertaking?' I now had much conversation with and asked him many questions, having forbore to do so previously, except in the cases noted in parenthesis; but during his statement, I had, unnoticed by him, taken notes as to some particular circumstances, and having the advantage of his statement before me in writing, on the evening of the third day that I had been with him, I began a cross-examination, and found his statement corroborated by every circumstance coming within my own knowledge, or the confessions of others who had been either killed or executed, and whom he had not seen or had any knowledge of since 22d of August last. He expressed himself fully satisfied as to the impracticability of his attempt. It has been said he was ignorant and cowardly, and that his object was to murder and rob for the purpose of obtaining money to make his escape. It is notorious, that he was never known to have a dollar in his life, to swear an oath, or drink a drop of spirits. As to his ignorance, he certainly never had the advantages of education, but he can read and write (it was taught him by his parents), and for natural intelligence and quickness of apprehension, is surpassed by few men I have ever seen. As to his being a coward, his reason as given for not resisting Mr. Phipps, shows the decision of his character. When he saw Mr. Phipps present his gun, he said he knew it was impossible for him to escape, as the woods were full of men; he therefore thought it was better to surrender, and trust to fortune for his escape. He is a complete fanatic, or plays his part most admirably. On other subjects he possesses an uncommon share of intelligence, with a mind capable of attaining anything, but warped and perverted by the influence of early impressions. He is below the ordinary stature, though strong and active, having the true negro face, every feature of which is strongly marked. I shall not attempt to describe the effect of his narrative, as told and commented on by himself, in the condemned hole of the prison. The calm, deliberate composure with which he spoke of his late deeds and intentions, the expression of his fiend-like face when excited by enthusiasm, still bearing the stains of the blood of helpless innocence about him; clothed with rags and covered with chains; yet daring to raise his manacled hands to heaven, with a spirit soaring above the attributes of man. I looked on him, and my blood curdled in my veins."

APPENDIX II.

THE Chapter headed JEGAR—SAHADUTHA contains some terrible stories. It is to be said they are all facts, on judicial record, of the most fiend-like cruelty, terminating in the death of the victim, where the affair has been judicially examined, and the perpetrator escaped death, and in most cases any punishment for his crime.

1. Case of Souther:—

"Souther v. The Commonwealth. 7 Grattan, 673, 1851.

"The killing of a slave by his master and owner, by wilful and excessive whipping, is murder in the first degree: though it may not have been the purpose and intention of the master and owner to kill the slave."

"Simon Souther was indicted at the October Term, 1850, of the Circuit Court for the County of Hanover, for the murder of his own slave. The indictment contained fifteen counts, in which the various modes of punishment and torture by which the homicide was charged to have been committed, were stated singly, and in various combinations. The fifteenth count unites them all: and, as the court certifies that the indictment was sustained by the evidence, the giving the facts stated in that count will show what was the charge against the prisoner, and what was the proof to sustain it.

"The count charged that on the 1st day of September, 1849, the prisoner tied his negro slave, Sam, with ropes about his wrists, neck, body, legs, and ankles to a tree. That whilst so tied, the prisoner first whipped the slave with switches. That he next beat and clobbered the slave with a shingle, and compelled two of his slaves, a man and a woman, also to cob the deceased with the shingle. That whilst the deceased was so tied to the tree, the prisoner did strike, knock, kick, stamp, and beat him upon various part of his head, face, and body, and he applied fire to his body; * * * * that he then washed his body with warm water, in which pods of red pepper had been put and steeped; and he compelled his two slaves aforesaid also to wash him with this same preparation of warm water and red pepper. That after the tying, whipping, cobbing, striking, beating, knocking, kicking, stamping, wounding, bruising, lacerating, burning, washing, and torturing, as aforesaid, the prisoner untied the deceased from the tree in such a way as to throw him with violence to the ground; and he then and there did knock, kick, stamp, and beat the deceased upon his head, temples, and various parts of his body. That the prisoner then had the deceased carried into a shed-room of his house, and there he compelled one of his slaves, in his presence, to confine the deceased's feet in stocks, by making his legs fast to a piece of timber, and to tie a rope about the neck of the deceased, and fasten it to a bed-post in the room, thereby strangling, choking, and suffocating the deceased. And that whilst the deceased was thus made fast in stocks as aforesaid, the prisoner did kick, knock, stamp, and beat him upon his head, face, breast, belly, sides, back, and body; and he again compelled his two slaves to apply fire to the body of the deceased, whilst he was so made fast as aforesaid. And the court charged that from these various modes of punishment and torture the slave Sam then and there died. It appeared that the prisoner commenced the punishment of the deceased in the morning, and that it was continued throughout the day: and that the deceased died in the presence of the prisoner, and one of his slaves, and one of the witnesses, whilst the punishment was still progressing.

"Field J. delivered the opinion of the court.

"The prisoner was indicted, and convicted of murder in the second degree, in the Circuit Court of Hanover, at its April term last past, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for five years, the period of time ascertained by the jury. The murder consisted in the killing of a negro man-slave by the name of Sam, the property of the prisoner, by cruel and excessive whipping and torture, inflicted by Souther, aided by two of his other slaves, on the 1st day of September, 1849. The prisoner moved for a new trial, upon the ground that the offence, if any, amounted only to manslaughter. The motion for a new trial was overruled, and a bill of exceptions taken to the opinion of the court, setting forth the facts proved, or as many of them as were deemed material for the consideration of the application for a new trial. The bill of exception states: That the slave Sam, in the indictment mentioned, was the slave and property of the prisoner. That for the purpose of chastising the slave for the offence of getting drunk, and dealing as the slave confessed and alleged with Henry and Stone, two of the witnesses for the Commonwealth, he caused him to be tied and punished in the presence of the said witnesses, with the exception of slight whipping with peach or apple-tree switches, before the said witnesses arrived at the scene after they were sent for by the prisoner (who were present by request from the defendant), and of several slaves of the prisoner, in the manner and by the means charged in the indictment; and the said slave died under and from the infliction of the said punishment, in the presence of the prisoner, one of his slaves, and of one of the witnesses for the Commonwealth. But it did not appear that it was the design of the prisoner to kill the said slave, unless such design be properly inferable from the manner, means, and duration of the punishment. And, on the contrary, it did appear that the prisoner frequently declared, while the said slave was undergoing the punishment, that he believed the said slave was feigning, and pretending to be suffering and injured when he was not. The judge certifies that the slave was punished in the manner and by the means charged in the indictment. The indictment contains fifteen counts, and sets forth a case of the most cruel and excessive whipping and torture. * * *

"It is believed that the records of criminal jurisprudence do not contain a case of more atrocious and wicked cruelty than was presented upon the trial of Souther; and yet it has been gravely and earnestly contended here by his counsel that his offence amounts to manslaughter only.

"It has been contended by the counsel of the prisoner that a man cannot be indicted and prosecuted for the cruel and excessive whipping of his own slave. That it is lawful for the master to chastise his slave, and that if death ensues from such chastisement, unless it was intended to produce death, it is like the case of homicide which is committed by a man in the performance of a lawful act, which is manslaughter only. It has been decided by this court in Turner's case, 5 Rand, that the owner of a slave, for the malicious, cruel and excessive beating of his own slave, cannot be indicted; yet it by no means follows, when such malicious, cruel and excessive beating results in death, though not intended and premeditated, that the beating is to be regarded as lawful for the purpose of reducing the crime to manslaughter, when the whipping is inflicted for the sole purpose of chastisement. It is the policy of the law, in respect to the relation of master and slave, and for the sake of securing proper subordination and obedience on the part of the slave, to protect the master from prosecution in all such cases, even if the whipping and punishment be malicious, cruel, and excessive. But in so inflicting punishment for the sake of punishment, the owner of the slave acts at his peril; and if death ensues in consequence of such punishment, the relation of master and slave affords no ground of excuse or palliation. The principles of the common law, in relation to homicide, apply to his case without qualification or exception; and according to those principles, the act of the prisoner, in the case under consideration, amounted to murder. * * * The crime of the prisoner is not manslaughter, but murder in the first degree."

2. Death of Hark.

The master is, as we have asserted, protected from prosecution by express enactment, if the victim dies in the act of resistance to his will, or under moderate correction.

"Whereas by another Act of the Assembly, passed in 1774, the killing of a slave, however wanton, cruel and deliberate, is only punishable in the first instance by imprisonment and paying the value thereof to the owner, which distinction of criminality between the murder of a white person and one who is equally a human creature, but merely of a different complexion, is DISGRACEFUL TO HUMANITY, AND DEGRADING IN THE HIGHEST DEGREE TO THE LAWS AND PRINCIPLES OF A FREE, CHRISTIAN AND ENLIGHTENED COUNTRY, Be it enacted, &c., That if any person shall hereafter be guilty of wilfully and maliciously killing a slave, such offender, shall, upon the first conviction thereof, be adjudged guilty of murder, and shall suffer the same punishment as if he had killed a free man: Provided always, this act shall not extend to the person killing a slave OUTLAWED BY VIRTUE OF ANY ACT OF ASSEMBLY OF THIS STATE, or to any slave in the act of resistance to his lawful owner or master, or to any slave dying under moderate correction."

Instance in point:—

"From the 'National Era,' Washington, November 6, 1851.

"HOMICIDE CASE IN CLARKE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

"Some time since, the newspapers of Virginia contained an account of a horrible tragedy, enacted in Clarke County, of that state. A slave of Colonel James Castleman, it was stated, had been chained by the neck, and whipped to death by his master, on the charge of stealing. The whole neighbourhood in which the transaction occurred was incensed; the Virginia papers abounded in denunciations of the cruel act; and the people of the North were called upon to bear witness to the justice which would surely be meted out in a slave state to the master of a slave. We did not publish the account. The case was horrible; it was, we were confident, exceptional; it should not be taken as evidence of the general treatment of slaves; we chose to delay any notice of it till the courts should pronounce their judgment, and we could announce at once the crime and its punishment, so that the state might stand acquitted of the foul deed.

"Those who were so shocked at the transaction will be surprised and mortified to hear that the actors in it have been tried and acquitted! and when they read the following account of the trial and verdict, published at the instance of the friends of the accused, their mortification will deepen into bitter indignation:

"From the 'Spirit of Jefferson.'

"COLONEL JAMES CASTLEMAN.—The following statement, understood to have been drawn up by counsel, since the trial, has been placed by the friends of this gentleman in our hands for publication:

"At the Circuit Superior Court of Clarke County, commencing on the 13th of October, Judge Samuels presiding, James Castleman and his son Stephen D. Castleman were indicted jointly for the murder of negro Lewis, property of the latter. By advice of their counsel, the parties elected to be tried separately, and the attorney for the commonwealth directed that James Castleman should be tried first.

"It was proved, on this trial, that for many months previous to the occurrence the money-drawer of the tavern kept by Stephen D. Castleman, and the liquors kept in large quantities in his cellar, had been pillaged from time to time, until the thefts had attained to a considerable amount. Suspicion had, from various causes, been directed to Lewis, and another negro, named Reuben (a blacksmith), the property of James Castleman; but by the aid of two of the house-servants they had eluded the most vigilant watch.

"On the 20th of August last, in the afternoon, S. D. Castleman accidentally discovered a clue, by means of which, and through one of the house-servants implicated, he was enabled fully to detect the depredators, and to ascertain the manner in which the theft had been committed. He immediately sent for his father, living near him, and after communicating what he had discovered, it was determined that the offenders should be punished at once, and before they should know of the discovery that had been made.

"Lewis was punished first; and in a manner, as was fully shown, to preclude all risk of injury to his person, by stripes with a broad leathern strap. He was punished severely, but to an extent by no means disproportionate to his offence; nor was it pretended, in any quarter, that this punishment implicated either his life or health. He confessed the offence, and admitted that it had been effected by false keys, furnished by the blacksmith, Reuben.

“The latter servant was punished immediately afterwards. It was believed that he was the principal offender, and he was found to be more obdurate and contumacious than Lewis had been in reference to the offence. Thus it was proved, both by the prosecution and the defence, that he was punished with greater severity than his accomplice. It resulted in a like confession on his part, and he produced the false key, one fashioned by himself, by which the theft had been effected.

“It was further shown, on the trial, that Lewis was whipped in the upper room of a warehouse, connected with Stephen Castleman’s store, and near the public road, where he was at work at the time; that after he had been flogged, to secure his person, whilst they went after Reuben, he was confined by a chain around his neck, which was attached to a joist above his head. The length of this chain, the breadth and thickness of the joist, its height from the floor, and the circle of chain on the neck, were accurately measured; and it was thus shown that the chain unoccupied by the circle and the joist was a foot and a half longer than the space between the shoulders of the man and the joist above, or to that extent the chain hung loose above him; that the circle (which was fastened so as to prevent its contraction) rested on the shoulders and breast, the chain being sufficiently drawn only to prevent being slipped over his head, and that there was no other place in the room to which he could be fastened except to one of the joists above. His hands were tied in front; a white man, who had been at work with Lewis during the day, was left with him by the Messrs. Castleman, the better to insure his detention, whilst they were absent after Reuben. It was proved by this man (who was a witness for the prosecution) that Lewis asked for a box to stand on, or for something that he could jump off from; that after the Castlemans had left him he expressed a fear that when they came back he would be whipped again; and said, if he had a knife, and could get one hand loose, he would cut his throat. The witness stated that the negro “stood firm on his feet,” that he could turn freely in whatever direction he wished, and that he made no complaint of the mode of his confinement. This man stated that he remained with Lewis about half an-hour, and then left there to go home.

“After punishing Reuben, the Castlemans returned to the warehouse, bringing him with them; their object being to confront the two men, in the hope that by further examination of them jointly all their accomplices might be detected.

“They were not absent more than half an-hour. When they entered the room above, Lewis was found hanging by the neck, his feet thrown behind him, his knees a few inches from the floor, and his head thrown forward—the body warm and supple (or relaxed), but life was extinct.

“It was proved by the surgeons who made a post-mortem examination before the coroner’s inquest that the death was caused by strangulation by hanging; and other eminent surgeons were examined to show, from the appearance of the brain and its blood-vessels after death (as exhibited at the post-mortem examination), that the subject could not have fainted before strangulation.

“ ‘ After the evidence was finished on both sides, the jury from their box, and of their own motion, without a word from counsel on either side, informed the court that they had agreed upon their verdict. The counsel assented to its being thus received, and a verdict of “Not guilty” was immediately rendered. The attorney for the commonwealth then informed the court that all the evidence for the prosecution had been laid before the jury; and as no new evidence could be offered on the trial of Stephen D. Castleman, he submitted to the court the propriety of entering a nolle prosequi. The judge replied that the case had been fully and fairly laid before the jury upon the evidence; that the court was not only satisfied with the verdict, but, if any other had been rendered, it must have been set aside; and that if no further evidence was to be adduced on the trial of Stephen, the attorney for the commonwealth would exercise a proper discretion in entering a nolle prosequi as to him, and the court would approve its being done. A nolle prosequi was entered accordingly, and both gentlemen discharged.

“ ‘ It may be added that two days were consumed in exhibiting the evidence, and that the trial was by a jury of Clarke County. Both the parties had been on bail from the time of their arrest, and were continued on bail whilst the trial was depending.’

“ Let us admit that the evidence does not prove the legal crime of homicide: what candid man can doubt, after reading this ex parte version of it, that the slave died in consequence of the punishment inflicted upon him?

“ In criminal prosecutions the federal constitution guarantees to the accused the right to a public trial by an impartial jury; the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favour; and to have the assistance of counsel; guarantees necessary to secure innocence against hasty or vindictive judgment,—absolutely necessary to prevent injustice. Grant that they were not intended for slaves; every master of a slave must feel that they are still morally binding upon him. He is the sole judge; he alone determines the offence, the proof requisite to establish it, and the amount of the punishment. The slave then has a peculiar claim upon him for justice. When charged with a crime, common humanity requires that he should be informed of it, that he should be confronted with the witnesses against him, that he should be permitted to show evidence in favour of his innocence.

“ But how was poor Lewis treated? The son of Castleman said he had discovered who stole the money; and it was forthwith ‘ determined that the offenders should be punished at once, and before they should know of the discovery that had been made.’ Punished without a hearing! Punished on the testimony of a house-servant, the nature of which does not appear to have been inquired into by the court! Not a word is said, which authorizes the belief that any careful examination was made, as it respects their guilt. Lewis and Reuben were assumed, on loose evidence, without deliberate investigation, to be guilty; and then, without allowing them to attempt to show their evidence, they were whipped, until a confession of guilt was extorted by bodily pain.

“ Is this Virginia justice?”

“To the Editor of the Era:

“I see that Castleman, who lately had a trial for whipping a slave to death in Virginia, was “triumphantly acquitted,”—as many expected. There are three persons in this city, with whom I am acquainted, who stayed at Castleman’s the same night in which this awful tragedy was enacted. They heard the dreadful lashing and the heart-rending screams and entreaties of the sufferer. They implored the only white man they could find on the premises, not engaged in the bloody work, to interpose; but for a long time he refused, on the ground that he was a dependent, and was afraid to give offence; and that, moreover, they had been drinking, and he was in fear for his own life, should he say a word that would be displeasing to them. He did, however, venture, and returned and reported the cruel manner in which the slaves were chained, and lashed, and secured in a blacksmith’s vice. In the morning, when they ascertained that one of the slaves was dead, they were so shocked and indignant that they refused to eat in the house, and reproached Castleman with his cruelty. He expressed his regret that the slave had died, and especially as he had ascertained that he was innocent of the accusation for which he had suffered. The idea was that he had fainted from exhaustion; and, the chain being round his neck, he was strangled. The persons I refer to are themselves slaveholders, —but their feelings were so harrowed and lacerated that they could not sleep (two of them are ladies); and for many nights afterwards their rest was disturbed, and their dreams made frightful, by the appalling recollection.

“These persons would have been material witnesses, and would have willingly attended on the part of the prosecution. The knowledge they had of the case was communicated to the proper authorities, yet their attendance was not required. The only witness was that dependent who considered his own life in danger.—“Yours, &c.,

“J. F.”

The Law of Outlawry.

Revised statutes of North Carolina, chap. cxi., sec. 22:—

“Whereas, MANY TIMES slaves run away and lie out, hid and lurking in swamps, woods, and other obscure places, killing cattle and hogs, and committing other injuries to the inhabitants of this state; in all such cases, upon intelligence of any slave or slaves lying out as aforesaid, any two justices of the peace for the county wherein such slave or slaves is or are supposed to lurk or do mischief, shall, and they are hereby empowered and required to issue proclamation against such slave or slaves (reciting his or their names, and the name or names of the owner or owners, if known) thereby requiring him or them, and every of them, forthwith to surrender (him or themselves; and also to empower and require the sheriff of the said county to take such power with him as he shall think fit and necessary for going in search and pursuit of, and effectually apprehending, such outlying slave or slaves; which proclamation shall be published at the door of the court-house, and at such other places as said justices shall direct. And if any slave or slaves against whom proclamation hath been thus issued stay out, and do not immediately return home, it shall be lawful for any person or persons whatsoever to kill and destroy such slave or slaves by such ways and means as he shall think fit, without accusation or impeachment of any crime for the same.”

That this law has not been a dead letter there is sufficient proof. In 1836 the following Proclamation and Advertisement appeared in the 'Newbern (N. C.) Spectator':—

"'STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, LENOIR COUNTY.—Whereas complaint hath been this day made to us, two of the justices of the peace for the said county, by William D. Cobb, of Jones County, that two negro-slaves belonging to him, named Ben (commonly known by the name of Ben Fox) and Rigdon, have absented themselves from their said master's service, and are lurking about in the Counties of Lenoir and Jones, committing acts of felony; these are, in the name of the state, to command the said slaves forthwith to surrender themselves, and turn home to their said master. And we do hereby also require the sheriff of said County of Lenoir to make diligent search and pursuit after the above-mentioned slaves. . . . And we do hereby, by virtue of an act of assembly of this state concerning servants and slaves, intimate and declare, if the said slaves do not surrender themselves and return home to their master immediately after the publication of these presents, that any person may kill or destroy said slaves by such means as he or they think fit, without accusation or impeachment of any crime or offence for so doing, or without incurring any penalty or forfeiture thereby.

"Given under our hands and seals, this 12th of November, 1836.

"JAS. JONES, J. P. [Seal.]

"$200 REWARD.—Ran away from the subscriber, about three years ago, a certain negro-man, named Ben, commonly known by the name of Ben Fox; also one other negro, by the name of Rigdon, who ran away on the 8th of this month.

"I will give the reward of $100 for each of the above negroes, to be delivered to me, or confined in the jail of Lenoir or Jones County, or for the killing of them, so that I can see them.

"Nov. 12, 1836.

"W. D. Conn."

"That this act was not a dead letter, also, was plainly implied in the protective act first quoted. If slaves were not, as a matter of fact, ever outlawed, why does the act formally recognize such a class?—'provided that this act shall not extend to the killing of any slave outlawed by any act of the assembly.' This language sufficiently indicates the existence of the custom.

"Further than this, the statute-book of 1821 contained two acts: the first of which provides that all masters in certain counties, who have had slaves killed in consequence of outlawry, shall have a claim on the treasury of the state for their value, unless cruel treatment of the slave be proved on the part of the master: the second act extends the benefits of the latter provision to all the counties in the state.

"Finally there is evidence that this act of outlawry was executed so recently as the year 1850,—the year in which 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was written. See the following from the Wilmington Journal of December 13, 1850.

"STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, NEW HANOVER COUNTY.—Whereas complaint upon oath hath this day been made to us, two of the justices of the peace for the said state and county aforesaid, by Guilford Horn, of Edgecombe County, that a certain male slave belonging to him, named Harry, a carpenter by trade, about forty years old, five feet five inches high, or thereabouts; yellow complexion; stout built; with a scar on his left leg (from the cut of an axe); has very thick lips; eyes deep sunk in his head; forehead very square; tolerably loud voice; has lost one or two of his upper teeth; and has a very dark spot on his jaw, supposed to be a mark,—hath absented himself from his master's service, and is supposed to be lurking about in this county, committing acts of felony or other misdeeds; these are, therefore, in the name of the state aforesaid, to command the said slave forthwith to surrender himself and return home to his said master; and we do hereby, by virtue of the act of assembly in such cases made and provided, intimate and declare that if the said slave Harry doth not surrender himself and return home immediately after the publication of these presents, that any person or persons may KILL and DESTROY the said slave by such means as he or they may think fit, without accusation or impeachment of any crime or offence in so doing, and without incurring any penalty or forfeiture thereby.

“Given under our hands and seals, this 29th day of June, 1850.

“JAMES T. MILLER, J. P. [Seal.]

“W. C. BETTENCOURT, J. P. [Seal.]

“ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS REWARD will be paid for the delivery of the said Harry to me at Tosnott Depot, Edgecombe County, or for his confinement in any jail in the state, so that I can get him; or One Hundred and Fifty Dollars will be given for his head.

“He was lately heard from in Newbern, where he called himself Henry Barnes (or Burns), and will be likely to continue the same name, or assume that of Copage or Farmer. He has a free mulatto woman for a wife, by the name of Sally Bozeman, who has lately removed to Wilmington, and lives in that part of the town called Texas, where he will likely be lurking.

“Masters of vessels are particularly cautioned against harbouring or concealing the said negro on board their vessels, as the full penalty of the law will be rigorously enforced.

APPENDIX III.

CHURCH ACTION ON SLAVERY.

In reference to this important subject, we present a few extracts from the first and second chapters of the fourth part of the “Key to Uncle Tom’s Cabin:”—

“The Methodist Society especially, as organized by John Wesley, was an anti-slavery society, and the Book of Discipline contained the most positive statutes against slave-holding. The history of the successive resolutions of the conference of this church is very striking. In 1780, before the church was regularly organized in the United States, they resolved as follows:—

“The Conference acknowledges that slavery is contrary to the laws of God, man and nature, and hurtful to society; contrary to the dictates of conscience and true religion; and doing what we would not others should do unto us.”

“In 1784, when the church was fully organized, rules were adopted prescribing the times at which members who were already slave-holders should emancipate their slaves. These rules were succeeded by the following:—

“Every person concerned, who will not comply with these rules shall have liberty quietly to withdraw from our society within the twelve months following the notice being given him, as aforesaid; otherwise the assistants shall exclude him from the society.

“No person holding slaves shall in future be admitted into society, or to the Lord's Supper, till he previously comply with these rules concerning slavery.

“Those who buy, sell, or give [slaves] away, unless on purpose to free them, shall be expelled immediately.”

“In 1801:—

“We declare that we are more than ever convinced of the great evil of African slavery, which still exists in these United States.

“Every member of the society who sells a slave shall, immediately after full proof, be excluded from the society, &c.

“The Annual Conferences are directed to draw up addresses, for the gradual emancipation of the slaves, to the legislature. Proper committees shall be appointed by the Annual Conferences, out of the most respectable of our friends, for the conducting of the business; and the presiding elders, deacons, and travelling preachers, shall procure as many proper signatures as possible to the addresses; and give all the assistance in their power, in every respect, to aid the committees, and to further the blessed undertaking. Let this be continued from year to year, till the desired end be accomplished.”

“In 1836 let us notice the change. The General Conference held its annual session in Cincinnati, and resolved as follows:

“Resolved, By the delegates of the Annual Conferences in General Conference assembled, That they are decidedly opposed to modern abolitionism, and wholly disclaim any right, wish, or intention, to interfere in the civil and political relation between master and slave, as it exists in the slave-holding states of this Union.”

“These resolutions were passed by a very large majority. An address was received from the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in England, affectionately remonstrating on the subject of slavery. The Conference refused to publish it. In the pastoral address to the churches are these passages:

“It cannot be unknown to you that the question of slavery in the United States, by the constitutional compact which binds us together as a nation is left to be regulated by the several state legislatures themselves; and thereby is put beyond the control of the general government, as well as that of all ecclesiastical bodies; it being manifest that in the slave-holding states themselves the entire responsibility of its existence, or non-existence, rests with those state legislatures. * * * These facts, which are only mentioned here as a reason for the friendly admonition which we wish to give you, constrain us, as your pastors, who are called to watch over your souls as they must give account, to exhort you to abstain from all abolition movements and associations, and to refrain from patronizing any of their publications, &c.' * * *

"The subordinate Conferences showed the same spirit.

"In 1836 the New York Annual Conference resolved that no one should be elected a deacon or elder in the church, unless he would give a pledge to the church that he would refrain from discussing this subject.*

"In 1838 the Conference resolved:

"As the sense of this Conference, that any of its members, or probationers, who shall patronize Zion's Watchman, either by writing in commendation of its character, by circulating it, recommending it to our people, or procuring subscribers, or by collecting or remitting moneys, shall be deemed guilty of indiscretion, and dealt with accordingly.'

"It will be recollected that Zion's Watchman was edited by Le Roy Sunderland, for whose abduction the state of Alabama had offered fifty thousand dollars.

"In 1840, the General Conference at Baltimore passed the resolution that we have already quoted, forbidding preachers to allow coloured persons to give testimony in their churches. It has been computed that about eighty thousand people were deprived of the right of testimony by this act. This Methodist Church subsequently broke into a Northern and Southern Conference. The Southern Conference is avowedly all pro-slavery, and the Northern Conference has still in its communion slaveholding Conferences and members.

"Of the Northern Conferences, one of the largest, the Baltimore, passed the following:—

"Resolved, That this Conference disclaims having any fellowship with abolitionism. On the contrary, while it is determined to maintain its well-known and long-established position, by keeping the travelling preachers composing its own body free from slavery, it is also determined not to hold connection with any ecclesiastical body that shall make non-slaveholding a condition of membership in the church; but to stand by and maintain the discipline as it is.'

"The following extract is made from an address of the Philadelphia Annual Conference to the Societies under its care, dated Wilmington Del., April 7, 1847:

"If the plan of separation gives us the pastoral care of you, it remains to inquire whether we have done anything, as a Conference, or as men, to forfeit your confidence and affection. We are not advised that even in the great excitement which has distressed you for some months past, any one has impeached our moral conduct, or charged us with unsoundness in doctrine, or corruption or tyranny in the administration of discipline. But we learn that the simple cause of the unhappy excitement among you is, that some suspect us, or affect to suspect us, of being abolitionists. Yet no particular act of the Conference, or any particular member thereof, is adduced, as the ground of the erroneous and injurious suspicion. We would ask you, brethren, whether the conduct of our ministry among you for sixty years past ought not to be sufficient to protect us from this charge. Whether the question we have been accustomed, for a few years past, to put to candidates for admission among us, namely, Are you an abolitionist? and, without each one answered in the negative, he was not received, ought not to protect us from the charge. Whether the action of the last Conference on this particular matter ought not to satisfy any fair and candid mind that we are not, and do not desire to be abolitionists.

* This resolution is given in Bruce's pamphlet.

* * * We cannot see how we can be regarded as abolitionists, without the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church South being considered in the same light. * * *

“Wishing you all heavenly benedictions, we are, dear brethren, yours in Christ Jesus,

‘ J. P. DURBIN,

‘ J. KENNADAY,

‘ IGNATIUS T. COOPER, Comm.’

‘ WILLIAM H. GILDER,

‘ JOSEPH CASTLE,

“These facts sufficiently define the position of the Methodist Church. The history is melancholy, but instructive. The history of the Presbyterian Church is also of interest.

“In 1793, the following note to the eighth commandment was inserted in the Book of Discipline, as expressing the doctrines of the church upon slave-holding:

“‘1 Tim. i. 10. The law is made for MAN-STEALERS. This crime among the Jews exposed the perpetrators of it to capital punishment, Exodus xxi. 15; and the apostle here classes them with sinners of the first rank. The word he uses, in its original import, comprehends all who are concerned in bringing any of the human race into slavery, or in retaining them in it. Hominum fures, qui servos vel liberos abducunt, retinent, vendunt, vel emunt. Stealers of men are all those who bring off slaves or freemen, and KEEP, SELL, or BUY THEM. To steal a free man, says Grotius, is the highest kind of theft. In other instances we only steal human property; but when we steal or retain men in slavery, we seize those who, in common with ourselves, are constituted by the original grant lords of the earth.’

“No rules of church discipline were enforced, and members whom this passage declared guilty of this crime remained undisturbed in its communion as ministers and elders. This inconsistency was obviated in 1816 by expunging the passage from the Book of Discipline. In 1818 it adopted an expression of its views on slavery. This document is a long one, conceived and written in a very Christian spirit. The Assembly’s Digest says, p. 341, that it was unanimously adopted. The following is its testimony as to the nature of slavery:

“‘We consider the voluntary enslaving of one part of the human race by another as a gross violation of the most precious and sacred rights of human nature; as utterly inconsistent with the law of God, which requires us to love our neighbour as ourselves; and as totally irreconcilable with the spirit and principles of the gospel of Christ, which enjoin that “all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.” Slavery creates a paradox in the moral system—it exhibits rational, accountable, and immortal beings in such circumstances as scarcely to leave them the power of moral action. It exhibits them as dependent on the will of others, whether they shall receive religious instruction; whether they shall know and worship the true God; whether they shall enjoy the ordinances of the gospel; whether they shall perform the duties and cherish the endearments of husbands and wives, parents and children, neighbours and friends; whether they shall preserve their chastity and purity, or regard the dictates of justice and humanity. Such are some of the consequences of slavery,—consequences not imaginary, but which connect themselves with its very existence. The evils to which the slave is always exposed often take place in fact, and in their very worst degree and form: and where all of them do not take place,—as we rejoice to say that in many instances, through the influence of the principles of humanity and religion on the minds of masters, they do not,—still the slave is deprived of his natural right, degraded as a human being, and exposed to the danger of passing into the hands of a master who may inflict upon him all the hardships and injuries which inhumanity and avarice may suggest.

“This language was surely decided, and it was unanimously adopted by slaveholders and non-slaveholders. Certainly one might think the time of redemption was drawing nigh. The declaration goes on to say:

“‘It is manifestly the duty of all Christians who enjoy the light of the present day, when the inconsistency of slavery both with the dictates of humanity and religion has been demonstrated and is generally seen and acknowledged, to use honest, earnest, and unwearied endeavours to correct the errors of former times, and as speedily as possible to efface this blot on our holy religion, and to OBTAIN THE COMPLETE ABOLITION of slavery throughout Christendom and throughout the world.’

“Here we have the Presbyterian Church, slaveholding and non-slaveholding, virtually formed into one great abolition society, as we have seen the Methodist was.

“The Assembly then goes on to state that the slaves are not at present prepared to be free,—that they tenderly sympathize with the portion of the church and country that has had this evil entailed upon them, where as they say ‘a great and most virtuous part of the community ABHOR SLAVERY and wish ITS EXTERMINATION.’ But they exhort them to commence immediately the work of instructing slaves, with a view to preparing them for freedom; and to let no greater delay take place than ‘a regard to public welfare indispensably demands;’ ‘to be governed by no other considerations than an honest and impartial regard to the happiness of the injured party, uninfluenced by the expense and inconvenience which such regard may involve.’ It warns against ‘unduly extending this plea of necessity,’ against making it a cover for the love and practice of slavery. It ends by recommending that any one who shall sell a fellow-Christian without his consent be immediately disciplined and suspended.

“If we consider that this was unanimously adopted by slaveholders and all, and grant, as we certainly do, that it was adopted in all honesty and good faith, we shall surely expect something from it. We should expect forthwith the organizing of a set of common schools for the slave-children; for an efficient religious ministration; for an entire discontinuance of trading in Christian slaves; for laws which make the family relations sacred. Was any such thing done or attempted? Alas! Two years after this came the ADMISSION OF MISSOURI; and the increase of demand in the southern slave-market and the internal slave-trade. Instead of school-teachers, they had slave-traders; instead of gathering schools, they gathered slave-coffles; instead of building school-houses, they built slave-pens and slave-prisons, jails, barracoons, factories, or whatever the trade pleases to term them; and so went the plan of gradual emancipation.

"In 1834, sixteen years after, a committee of the Synod of Kentucky, in which state slavery is generally said to exist in its mildest form, appointed to make a report on the condition of the slaves, gave the following picture of their condition. First, as to their spiritual condition, they say:

"After making all reasonable allowances, our coloured population can be considered, at the most, but semi-heathen. As to their temporal estate—brutal stripes, and all the various kinds of personal indignities, are not the only species of cruelty which slavery licenses. The law does not recognize the family relations of the slave, and extends to him no protection in the enjoyment of domestic endearments. The members of a slave-family may be forcibly separated, so that they shall never meet until the final judgment. And cupidity often induces the masters to practise what the law allows. Brothers and sisters, parents and children, husbands and wives, are torn asunder, and permitted to see each other no more. These acts are daily occurring in the midst of us. The shrieks and the agony often witnessed on such occasions proclaim with a trumpet-tongue the iniquity and cruelty of our system. The cries of these sufferers go up to the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. There is not a neighborhood where these heart-rending scenes are not displayed. There is not a village or road that does not behold the sad procession of manacled outcasts, whose chains and mournful countenances tell that they are exiled by force from all that their hearts hold dear. Our church, years ago, raised its voice of solemn warning against this flagrant violation of every principle of mercy, justice, and humanity. Yet we blush to announce to you and to the world that this warning has been often disregarded, even by those who hold to our communion. Cases have occurred, in our own denomination, where professors of the religion of mercy have torn the mother from her children, and sent her into a merciless and returnless exile. Yet acts of discipline have rarely followed such conduct."

"Hon. James G. Birney, for years a resident of Kentucky, in his pamphlet, amends the word rarely by substituting never. What could show more plainly the utter inefficiency of the past act of the Assembly, and the necessity of adopting some measures more efficient? In 1835, therefore, the subject was urged upon the General Assembly, entreating them to carry out the principles and designs they had avowed in 1818.

"Mr. Stuart, of Illinois, in a speech he made upon the subject, said:

"I hope this Assembly are prepared to come out fully and declare their sentiments, that slaveholding is a most flagrant and heinous sin. Let us not pass it by in this indirect way, while so many thousands and tens of thousands of our fellow-creatures are writhing under the lash, often inflicted, too, by ministers and elders of the Presbyterian Church.

"In this Church a man may take a free-born child, force it away from its parents, to whom God gave it in charge, saying "Bring it up for me," and sell it as a beast or hold it in perpetual bondage, and not only escape corporeal punishment, but really be esteemed an excellent Christian. Nay, even ministers of the gospel and doctors of divinity may engage in this unholy traffic, and yet sustain their high and holy calling.

"Elders, ministers, and doctors of divinity, are, with both hands, engaged in the practice."

"One would have thought facts like these, stated to a body of Christians, were enough to wake the dead; but, alas! we can become accustomed to very awful things. No action was taken upon these remonstrances, except to refer them to a committee, to be reported on at the next session, in 1836.

"The moderator of the Assembly in 1836 was a slaveholder, Dr. T. S. Witherspoon, the same who said to the editor of the Emancipator, 'I draw my warrant from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to hold my slaves in bondage. The principle of holding the heathen in bondage is recognized by God. When the tardy process of the law is too long in redressing our grievances, we at the South have adopted the summary process of Judge Lynch.'

"The majority of the committee appointed made a report as follows:

"Whereas the subject of slavery is inseparably connected with the laws of many of the states in this Union, with which it is by no means proper for an ecclesiastical judicature to interfere, and involves many considerations in regard to which great diversity of opinion and intensity of feeling are known to exist in the churches represented in this Assembly: And whereas there is great reason to believe that any action on the part of this Assembly, in reference to this subject, would tend to distract and divide our churches, and would probably in nowise promote the benefit of those whose welfare is immediately contemplated in the memorials in question.

"Therefore, Resolved,

"1. That it is not expedient for the Assembly to take any further order in relation to this subject.

"2. That as the notes which have been expunged from our public formularies, and which some of the memorials referred to the committee request to have restored, were introduced irregularly, never had the sanction of the Church, and therefore never possessed any authority, the General Assembly has no power, nor would they think it expedient, to assign them a place in the authorized standards of the Church.'

"The minority of the committee, the Rev. Messrs. Dickey and Beman, reported as follows:—

"Resolved,

"1. That the buying, selling, or holding a human being as property, is in the sight of God a heinous sin, and ought to subject the doer of it to the censure of the Church.

"2. That it is the duty of every one, and especially of every Christian, who may be involved in this sin, to free himself from its entanglement without delay.

"3. That it is the duty of every one, especially of every Christian, in the meekness and firmness of the gospel, to plead the cause of the poor and needy, by testifying against the principle and practice of slaveholding; and to use his best endeavours to deliver the Church of God from the evil; and to bring about the emancipation of the slaves in these United States, and throughout the world.'

"The slaveholding delegates, to the number of forty-eight, met apart, and Resolved,

"That if the General Assembly shall undertake to exercise authority on the subject of slavery, so as to make it an immorality, or shall in any way declare that Christians are criminal in holding slaves, that a declaration shall be presented by the southern delegation declining their jurisdiction in the case, and our determination not to submit to such decision.'

"In view of these conflicting reports, the Assembly resolved as follows:

"Inasmuch as the constitution of the Presbyterian Church, in its preliminary and fundamental principles, declares that no Church judicatories ought to pretend to make laws to bind the conscience in virtue of their own authority; and as the urgency of the business of the Assembly, and the shortness of time during which they can continue in session, render it impossible to deliberate and decide judiciously on the subject of slavery in its relation to the Church; therefore, Resolved, That this whole subject be indefinitely postponed.'

"The amount of the slave-trade at the time when the General Assembly refused to act upon the subject of slavery at all, may be inferred from the following item. The Virginia Times, in an article published in this very year of 1836, estimated the number of slaves exported for sale from that state alone, during the twelve months preceding, at forty thousand. The Natchez (Miss.) Courier says that in the same year the States of Alabama, Missouri and Arkansas, received two hundred and fifty thousand slaves from the more northern states. If we deduct from these all who may be supposed to have emigrated with their masters, still what an immense trade is here indicated!

"The Rev. James H. Dickey, who moved the resolutions above presented, had seen some sights which would naturally incline him to wish the Assembly to take some action on the subject, as appears from the following account of a slave-coffe, from his pen.

"In the summer of 1822, as I returned with my family from a visit to the Barrens of Kentucky, I witnessed a scene such as I never witnessed before, and such as I hope never to witness again. Having passed through Paris, in Bourbon County, Ky., the sound of music (beyond a little rising ground) attracted my attention. I looked forward, and saw the flag of my country waving. Supposing that I was about to meet a military parade, I drove hastily to the side of the road; and, having gained the ascent, I discovered (I suppose) about forty black men all chained together after the following manner: each of them was handcuffed, and they were arranged in rank and file. A chain perhaps forty feet long, the size of a fifth-horse-chain, was stretched between the two ranks, to which short chains were joined, which connected with the handcuffs. Behind them were, I suppose, about thirty women, in double rank, the couples tied hand to hand. A solemn sadness sat on every countenance, and the dismal silence of this march of despair was interrupted only by the sound of two violins; yes, as if to add insult to injury, the foremost couple were furnished with a violin a-piece; the second couple were ornamented with cockades, while near the centre waved the republican flag, carried by a hand literally in chains. I could not forbear exclaiming to the lordly driver who rode at his ease alongside, "Heaven will curse that man who engages in such traffic, and the government that protects him in it!" I pursued my journey till evening, and put up for the night, when I mentioned the scene I had witnessed. "Ah!" cried my landlady, "that is my brother!" From her I learned that his name is Stone, of Bourbon county, Kentucky, in partnership with one Kinningham, of Paris; and that a few days before he had purchased a negro-woman from a man in Nicholas county. She refused to go with him; he attempted to compel her, but she defended herself. Without further ceremony, he stepped back, and, by a blow on the side of her head with the butt of his whip, brought her to the ground; he tied her, and drove her off. I learned further, that besides the drove I had seen, there were about thirty shut up in the Paris prison for safe-keeping, to be added to the company, and that they were designed for the Orleans market. And to this they are doomed for no other crime than that of a black skin and curled locks. Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord. Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

"It cannot be possible that these Christian men realised these things or, at most, they realised them just as we realise the most tremendous truths of religion, dimly and feebly.

"Two years after, the General Assembly by a sudden and very unexpected movement passed a vote excising, without trial, from the communion of the church, four synods comprising the most active and decided anti-slavery portions of the church. The reasons alleged were, doctrinal differences and ecclesiastical practices inconsistent with Presbyterianism. By this act about five hundred ministers and sixty thousand members were cut off from the Presbyterian Church.

"That portion of the Presbyterian Church called New School, considering this act unjust, refused to assent to it, joined the excised synods, and formed themselves into the New School General Assembly. In this communion only three slave-holding presbyteries remained. In the old there were between thirty and forty.

"The course of the Old School Assembly after the separation, in relation to the subject of slavery, may be best expressed by quoting one of their resolutions, passed in 1845. Having some decided anti-slavery members in its body, and being, moreover, addressed on the subject of slavery by associated bodies, they presented, on this year, the following deliberate statement of their policy. (Minutes for 1845, p. 18.)

"Resolved, 1st. That the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States was originally organized, and has since continued the bond of union in the Church, upon the conceded principle that the existence of domestic slavery, under the circumstances in which it is found in the southern portion of the country, is no bar to Christian communion.

"2. That the petitions that ask the Assembly to make the holding of slaves in itself a matter of discipline do virtually require this judicatory to dissolve itself, and abandon the organization under which, by the Divine blessing, it has so long prospered. The tendency is evidently to separate the northern from the southern portion of the Church—a result which every good Christian must deplore, as tending to the dissolution of the Union of our beloved country, and which every enlightened Christian will oppose, as bringing about a ruinous and unnecessary schism between brethren who maintain a common faith.

"Yeas, Ministers and Elders . . . 168

Nays . . . 13

"It is scarcely necessary to add a comment to this very explicit declaration. It is the plainest possible disclaimer of any protest against slavery; the plainest possible statement that the existence of the ecclesiastical organization is of more importance than all the moral and social considerations which are involved in a full defence and practice of American slavery.

"The next year a large number of petitions and remonstrances were presented, requesting the Assembly to utter additional testimony against slavery.

"In reply to the petitions, the General Assembly reaffirmed all their former testimonies on the subject of slavery for sixty years back, and also affirmed that the previous year's declaration must not be understood as a retraction of that testimony; in other words, they expressed it as their opinion, in the words of 1818, that slavery is 'WHOLLY OPPOSED TO THE LAW OF GOD,' and 'TOTALLY IRRECONCILABLE WITH THE PRECEPTS OF THE GOSPEL OF CHRIST;' and yet that they 'had formed their' church organization upon the conceded principle that the existence of it, under the circumstances in which it is found in the Southern States of the Union, is no bar to Christian communion.'

"Some members protested against this action. (Minutes, 1846. Overture No. 17.)

"Great hopes were at first entertained of the New School body. As a body, it was composed mostly of anti-slavery men. It had in it those synods whose anti-slavery opinions and actions had been, to say the least, one very efficient cause for their excision from the church. It had only three slaveholding presbyteries. The power was all in its own hands. Now, if ever, was their time to cut this loathsome incumbrance wholly adrift, and stand up, in this age of concession and conformity to the world, a purely protesting church, free from all complicity with this most dreadful national immorality.

"On the first session of the General Assembly, this course was most vehemently urged, by many petitions and memorials. These memorials were referred to a committee of decided anti-slavery men. The argument on one side was, that the time was now come to take decided measures to cut free wholly from all pro-slavery complicity, and avow their principles with decision, even though it should repel all such churches from their communion as were not prepared for immediate emancipation.

"On the other hand, the majority of the committee were urged by opposing considerations. The brethren from slave states made to them representations somewhat like these: 'Brethren, our hearts are with you. We are with you in faith, in charity, in prayer. We sympathized in the injury that had been done you by excision. We stood by you then, and are ready to stand by you still. We have no sympathy with the party that have expelled you, and we do not wish to go back to them. As to this matter of slavery, we do not differ from you. We consider it an evil. We mourn and lament over it. We are trying, by gradual and peaceable means, to exclude it from our churches. We are going as far in advance of the sentiment of our churches as we consistently can. We cannot come up to more decided action without losing our hold over them, and, as we think, throwing back the cause of emancipation. If you begin in this decided manner, we cannot hold our churches in the union; they will divide, and go to the Old School.'

"Here was a very strong plea, made by good and sincere men. It was an appeal, too, to the most generous feelings of the heart. It was, in effect, saying, 'Brothers, we stood by you, and fought your battles, when everything was going against you; and, now that you have the power in your hands, are you going to use it so as to cast us out?'

"These men, strong anti-slavery men as they were, were affected.

One member of the committee foresaw and feared the result. He felt and suggested that the course proposed conceded the whole question. The majority thought, on the whole, that it was best to postpone the subject. The committee reported that the applicants, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, had withdrawn their papers.

"The next year, in 1839, the subject was resumed; and it was again urged that the Assembly should take high and decided and unmistakable ground; and certainly, if we consider that all this time not a single church had emancipated its slaves, and that the power of the institution was everywhere stretching and growing and increasing, it would certainly seem that something more efficient was necessary than a general understanding that the Church agreed with the testimony delivered in 1818. It was strongly represented that it was time something was done. This year the Assembly decided to refer the subject to Presbyteries, to do what they deemed advisable. The words employed were these: 'Solemnly referring the whole subject to the lower judicatories, to take such action as in their judgment is most judicious, and adapted to remove the evil.' This of course deferred, but did not avert, the main question.

"This brought, in 1840, a much larger number of memorials and petitions; and very strong attempts were made by the abolitionists to obtain some decided action.

"The committee this year referred to what had been done last year, and declared it inexpedient to do anything further. The subject was indefinitely postponed. At this time it was resolved that the Assembly should meet only once in three years.* Accordingly, it did not meet till 1843. In 1843, several memorials were again presented, and some resolutions offered to the Assembly, of which this was one (Minutes of the General Assembly for 1843, p. 15):

"Resolved, That we affectionately and earnestly urge upon the Ministers, Sessions, Presbyteries and Synods connected with this Assembly, that they treat this as all other sins of great magnitude; and, by a diligent, kind, and faithful application of the means which God has given them, by instruction, remonstrance, reproof, and effective discipline, seek to purify the Church of this great iniquity.'

"This resolution they declined. They passed the following:

"Whereas there is in this Assembly great diversity of opinion as to the proper and best mode of action on the subject of slavery; and whereas, in such circumstances, any expression of sentiment would carry with it but little weight, as it would be passed by a small majority, and must operate to produce alienation and division; and whereas the Assembly of 1839, with great unanimity, referred this whole subject to the lower judicatories, to take such order as in their judgment might be adapted to remove the evil;—Resolved, That the Assembly do not think it for the edification of the Church for this body to take any action on the subject.'

"They, however, passed the following:—

"Resolved, That the fashionable amusement of promiscuous dancing is so entirely unscriptural, and eminently and exclusively that of "the world which lieth in wickedness," and so wholly inconsistent with the spirit of Christ, and with that propriety of Christian deportment and that purity of heart which his followers are bound to maintain, as to render it not only improper and injurious for professing Christians either to partake in it or to qualify their children for it, by teaching them the art, but also to call for the faithful and judicious exercise of discipline on the part of Church Sessions, when any of the members of their churches have been guilty.”

Thus the matter has gone on from year to year till the present time. In 1856 we are sorry to say that we can report no improvement in the action of the great ecclesiastical bodies on the subject of slavery, but rather deterioration. Notwithstanding all the aggressions of slavery, and notwithstanding the constant developments of its horrible influence in corrupting and degrading the character of the nation, as seen in the mean, vulgar, assassin-like outrages in our national Congress, and the brutal, bloodthirsty, fiend-like proceedings in Kansas, connived at and protected, if not directly sanctioned and in part instigated by our national government;—notwithstanding all this, the great ecclesiastical organisations seem less disposed than ever before to take any efficient action on the subject. This was manifest in the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church North, held at Indianapolis during the spring of the present year, and in the general assemblies of the Presbyterian Church, held at New York at about the same time.

True, a very large minority in the Methodist Conference resisted with great energy the action, or rather no action, of the majority, and gave fearless utterance to the most noble sentiments; but in the final result the numbers were against them.

The same thing was true to some extent in the New School Presbyterian General Assembly, though here the anti-slavery utterances were, on the whole, inferior to those in the Methodist Conference. In both bodies the Packthreads and Cushings and Calkers and Bonnies are numerous, and have the predominant influence, while the Dicksons are fewer, and have far less power. The representations, therefore, in the body of the work, though very painful, are strictly just. Individuals, everywhere in the free states, and in some of the slave states, are most earnestly struggling against the prevailing corruption; but the churches, as such, are for the most part still on the wrong side. There are churches free from this stain, but they are neither numerous nor popular.
